what pacified, but not suppressed; that pestilent humor of disloyaltie having before infested the minds of fo many, as that in short time after the Rebels were much stronger, and the Rebellion much more dangerous than before. For the appearing and suppressing whereof, Gicala Bassa the old Renegate and a man of great experience and service, was sent by the Graund Sultan as Generall, with a great and mighty Army into Asia , where hee needed not long to looke for his enemies, they being as ready as he either to give or to accept of battel : so that for men fo on both fides resolved, it was no hard matter to bring them to the trial of a battel. cicala Baffa a- Which they with like defire and equall minde joyning, there made a great and terrible fight, the Bassa fighting for his honour, and the Rebell for his life: howbeit that at length, the Bassa fa after much bloud shed and a great number on both sides slaine, being put to the worse, sleet with his Army altogether difordered and in rout, having in that fo dangerous a confusion of his people muchado to faue himselse. With which so shamefull an ouerthrow given him by the Rebell, the Baffa was more ashamed than discouraged; who again repaired his Army, L ioyning thereunto great and mighty supplies, and so strengthned, came now again the second time, to revenge himselfe of the great dishonour which he had before received, and viterly to suppresse the Rebels. Who now finding themselves too weake to incounter with so great and mighty a power, wifely betimes retyred, praying aid of the Persian King, who sent wood them his owne fonne with a great Army of good and valiant fouldiers. The which might have given the Baffa cause enough to have stayed his haste, and to have been well aduited, how he joined battell with such desperate and resolute enemies, and now backt with such strong supplies. But he being blinded with the sury of his former losse, and too much desirous to be thereof reuenged, with more hast than good speed came on, and joined battel with these his enemies, who were now in readinesse, and well prouided to receive him. The two M Armies were in number equall; but the Rebels of the two more resolute and carefull of themsclues and of their welfare, as they which had reposed all their hope and considence in their owne armes and valour; fo that the battel was with great outcries and fury begun both on the

in the mean time went. The rebellion in Alia was by the comming ouer of Zellaly and his followers for a time somA one fide and the other: in the beginning wherof the Turks right furiously charged the rebels. and seemed somewhat to prevaile vpon them; vntill that the Persian Kings son with certaine troups of his most braue horsmen charging them in the rereward, & some other of the rebels with like fury affailing them vpon their flanks, their whole army was fo difordred, that Cicala Cicala against doing what he could to put his men again in order, and so to have restored the battel, nothing therin prevailed, but was glad together with the rest of his army, now all in rout, to betake himself to flight. In this battel were forty thousand men slain on both sides, whereof thirty thousand were of the Bassa's Army, and the rest of the Rebels; who by this sogreat a victorie gained no lesse honour and reputation, than had the Sultans Generall got contempt and difgrace.

The Persian King after this great discomsiture of the Turkes, continuing his conquests. took in the Countrey of Sirvan, (a matter of great importance) beeing now destitute of all reliefe, by the ouerthrow of Gicala Baffa, who had he prevailed against the Rebells, should have marched thither against the Persian King, to have stayed the course of his victories: who now victorious and out of fear, made head toward Arusta, a very great and strong towne, neerwhereunto the river Tygris dischargeth it selfe into the great river of Euphrates; the which City he at last won, with all the places and countries thereunto adjoyning and hath fince as a most happy and victorious Prince againe recourred from the Turkes, what socuer they had fince Sultan Solymans time by force of armes taken from the Persian Kingshis predecessors, two or three strong places only excepted. Of which most notable Wars betwixt o these two the most mighty Princes of the East, that is to say, the Great Turke and the Persian King, I can rather with than hope to be better informed; and that not fo much for curiofity, (although that the knowledge of such matters yeeld vnto such as bee desirous thereof great pleasure, with no lesse contentment) as for that they (though very farre off) in some fort much concern the good and quiet of the Christian Commonweale, the Persian wars beeing great cost and harm feel, so soon as these two Mahometane Princes shall be at peace among fr themselues. But leaue we the Bassa a while to gricue at his ouerthrowes, and the Persian King to tri- Achmas sick of umph of these victories, and see what the great Sultan himself in the mean time doth. This yong Prince Achmat (now one of the greatest Monarchs in the world) had not many auerted from the Christians in Europe, vpon the Persians in Asia: as it is greatly to be feared.

that some one or other, if not more, of the Christian Princes neerest vnto him, shall to their months reigned, but that he fel fick of the smal pox, wherwith he having a grosse & sulbody, was fo foully tormented for a fortnights space, that oftentimes fainting, it was generally supposed he would therof haue died : Yea, divers of the great Bassa's were in speech concerning his yonger brother to be taken out of the Seraglio to fucceed him which was thought would haue cost him his life, after that the Sultan his elder brother was again recouered. And no doubt it had but that he was the onely Heir then left of the Othoman Family, if that his brother the Sultan (hould have failed. But he againe recovering of his foul and childish difease, E to shew vnto the Ianizaries and others who doubted thereof, that he was so recoursed, most proudly mounted upon a goodly horse sumptuously furnished, and in great state and magnificence rid ap and down thorow most of the chiefe streets of the Imperial city of Constantinople; the people (as their accustomed manner is) in every place as he went rejoyeing to see him, and profecuting him with their most joyfull acclamations, wishing vnto him a long and happy reigne. Neither is it any manuell, seeing the almighty God hath even in the faces and countenances of Princes ingrauen some resemblance of his owne, if they become respective and admirable in the eies and fight of the common people, who cannot but honor them with their voyces, whom God hath bleffed with his power, and other his extraordinarie worldly bleffings.

This yong prince so recoursed of his sicknesseand having shewed himself to his subjects. began forthwith to give himselfe (according to the heat of his youthfull spirit) immoderatly vnto the pleasures of the field, and other such violent exercises, being in their moderate vse wholsome, but in their violences much hurtfull, but especially upon the new recovery of his late ficknesse, the griefes whereof came in hast, but were to leave him at leisure. Whereupon G two of his Baffaes carefull of his health, were to bold, as our of their loue to reproue him for fuch his violent and immoderate exercises (the day not being long enough for them) and by effectuall reasons to diffuade him from the same. But so far off was he from heatkening vnto their wholfome perfuafions, as that to the contrary he therwith inraged, thrust them both out of their places. So dangerous a thing it is, euen in zeale and loue to prefume to controll great Princes in their most vain pleasures, others in the mean time not louing them at all, but only for their owne profit attending vpon their idle appetites, injoying the preferments due vnto their more faithfull and loyall fubicets, and yet fecretly in themfelues, fmiling at the vanitie of fuch as by whom they be so vnworthily honoured and promoted.

But as in the immoderate vse of all things there is a fatietie which breedeth a disliking and H distaste of them (pleasures being not by any meanes more commended, than by their novelties and seldome vse) so this young Sultan Achmat having glutted himselfe with his plea. sures, began now to cast his eyes vpon his other more necessarie affaires of State, but especially voon his warres both with the Christian Emperour and the Mahometane Persian King, Now here was not ignorant of the great valour and sufficiencie of Hassan the Visier Basia, for the mannaging of his warres in Hungarie, wherein hee had of long time been exercised, and fo therein best experienced. This old Captaine pleased him best, whom as an old, expert, and politicke Generall, hee resolued to continue in his charge as Lieutenant Generall of his warres in Hungarie, and by the continuation of him in fo great and honourable a place, to repart General binde him to all loyall services in those warres, even to the vetermost of his power. This ! Great Basta was then at Belgrade, vpon the frontier of his gouernment in doubtfull suspense expecting the resolution of his Prince concerning this businesse, and yet in hope longing after a second charge: Whose longing desire Achmat quickly satisfied, by sending vntohim both a commission for the continuation of his charge and dignitic, and certaine honourable Presents in token of his extraordinarie fauor towards him; which were a Generals Ensigne, with an Hungarian Mace of pure gold. Now whether these Presents, joyned vnto the continuation of his charge, were welcome vnto him or not, ambitious minds (fuch as was his) can easily tell: and hee to shew his contentment therewith, gaue thereof good testimonie by the publicke actions of joy, caufing all the great Ordnance of the place in thundring wife to be oftentimes discharged, and the Trumpets and Drummes to be most joyfully K founded.

In the meane time newes was brought to Constantinople, how that the Persian King haning mustred his men, was in the field with aboue an hundred thousand good fouldiers, and that Bugages Baffa, one of the great Rebels in Asia, had confederated himselfe with him, to the further troubling of the Turks estate. Whereupon Achmat, although he had before given order vnto Hassan the Visier Bassa his Lieutenant in Hungary, for the besieging and taking of Veradinum, a strong City in the vpper Hungary, now by a messenger sent in hast, commanded the same Bassa, all other businesses set apart, with all the power that he could make, forthwith to returne to Constantinople, there with him and the rest of the Bassa's to consult and resolute vpon the most necessarie warre, and of the readiest meanes for the continuing of the same. For L albeit that the Turks were most desirous to have warres with the Christians, and so (if it were possible) to have conquered the remainders of Hungary; yet the danger of the Persian warres, and of the rebellion in Asia daily more and more increasing, suffered them not wholly to attend vnto the warres against the Christians in Hungary, but drew them now into a doubtfull confultation, which way first to turne their forces. But being come to Constantinople, the Grand Seigniour tooke the paines and did him the honour to come vnto his house; whither the Councell for the State being affembled, it was there most proudly resolued vpon, euen forthwith at one and the felfe same time with equall forces to make warre both vponthe Christian Emperour in Hungary, and the Persian King in Asia, accounting themselves strong enough to subdue and bring vnder foot both the one and the other, no power upon M carth being in their proud conceit of themselves able to encounter or wirhstand theirs. So for the mannaging of these warres, and of their so proud a resolution to be performed in so remote parts of the world, Hassan Bassa was continued in his charge, as Generall of the army

A in Hungary; and Cicala Baffa was appointed to have the command of the army to be fent against the Persian : Two most expert Captains, being to fight against their heredetarie enemies, Hassan against the Christians, and Cicala against the Persians, by whom he had not long before bin euil vsed. An ordinary policy of the Otheman Emperors, not to commit the charge of their armies against the Christians, vnto Renegates; for feare lest they, touched with some remorfe of conscience, might bettay the same, or otherwise deale vnfaithfully in their charge: but still to imploy them against the Persians, of whom they have no surther knowledge, but as of their enemies in the field. But Cicala Baffawell acquainted both with the difficulty and the danger of the Persian war, (the scarres whereof he yet bare about with him) made shew as if he had been vinwilling to take vpon him the charge thereof; and fo begun to excure him-B felfe, vntill that at length vpon promife made vnto him, for the turnithing of him with a fufficient army, and all things els necessary for so great a war, with a large and most honourable entertainment for himselfe, and all the Persian prisoners being also given vnto him in reward; he therewith contented, accepted of the honourable charge, whereof in his ambitious mind he was indeed most desirous. And so receiving the Generals Ensigne, with the other marks and cognisances of his honour, causing the Drums tobe strucken vp, and the Trumpets to bee joyfully founded, he cheerfully prepared himfelfe for that his fo great an expedition; expe-Ging but the comming of his sonne, who at the request of the Venetians was gon forth with affect of gallies to scoure the Lenant seas of the Pyrats, who then exceedingly troubled the trafficke of the Venetian Merchants.

Anuiddest which the Turks so great designes, the Tartar Cham, bound for his pay to serve the Great Turke in his warres against the Christians; by his Embassadour excused himselfe unto the Great Sultan, for that he could not himselfe in person come this yeare with his forces into Hungary, by reason that he was otherwise necessarily busied with the most vegent affaires of his owne Estate: yet promising withall, in stead of himselfe, to send his sun with a good power of men. Now whereas many men maruell, why the Tartar Cham, being fo The reasons greata Prince, and not much in danger vnto the Turke (being separated from him by the why the Tar-Blackeor Euxine sea) should be still so ready at the Turks call, to do him service in his ready to serve wartes; The causes whereof are divers, and those not far to seeke. First, their neere affi the great lack nitie (as both descended from the same beginning, by often marriages still confirm diffen, in his was a D Their likenesse of manners and condition, no small bonds of lone and friendship: And third want. ly, For that the Turkish Empire forwant of heires males of the Othoman Family, is affured, and as it were entailen vnto the Tartar Cham : But most of all, For the yearely pention and great pay which he, being a bare Prince, receiveth from the Turks; his rude and nee-die people being also euer ready, in hope of the spoyle, to follow him into those warres. But this his excuse for not comming himselfe this yeare into Hungary, being by the Great Sultan accepted of, Hassan Bassa resolved upon his expedition for Hungary, made great preparation for the good successe of the warre there, gaue great hope thereof vnto the Great Sultan, and caused himselse to be proclaimed Lieutenant Generall of all the Great Sultans Forces against the Christians: every man affourding vnto these good hopes a thousand wi-E shes for his health and welfare : but especially the Mahometane Priests affired him of their helpe, fo that hee would not faile to do the vttermost of his endeauour against the Christians their enemies. For why, the Turks doe account him the best and most zealous man, which can do the Christians most harme. And so with these great acclamations of joy and honour, Haffan the great Baffa fet forward with his army from Constantinople, towards Hun-

The Christian Emperor ignorant of all these the Turks great preparations and haughty Maximilian defignes, fought by all meanes how to refift them, sparing northing that might any way ferue the declared for Embaga. or fland him in flead to that purpose. Experience had affured him of the Popes readine fle in dour from the contributing to this action, what in his power was; having before received formany testimo. Emperaturate contributing to this action, what in his power was; having before received formany testimo. Emperaturate the trape, to nies of his good wil. Which causedhim now to dispatchasso his brother Maximilian the archerage his and duke, a good and a denout Prince, to him, with expresse charge in the Emperors name to yeeld against the all submission to his Holines, to moue him to relieue the wofull estate of his distressed affairs. Twee. Maximilian setting forward about this busines, arrived at Venice, where he was by that State right honorably entertained. From Venice he trauelling toward Rome, and with a great Re. G tione approching the city, was there met by a great number of Noblemen with their Follow. ers, fent from the Pope; and so by them with great honour was brought into the Vatican Palace, to the intent that so he might the oftner and with more case have accesse unto the Pope, who then lay there fick of the gout. The next day he being brought vnto the Popes presence, & after viual reuerence don hauing audience giuen him, in the presence of the cardinals he began to deliuer vnto him the causes of his comming, which (as he said) were two: first, To put his Holinesse in remembrance of the manifest peril and danger which hung ouer the heads of the Christians in general, from the Turk, but especially ouer them of Italy, being so neer the Turkish Empire, and a great gap laid open for the Turks therinto to enter, by the way of Canisia the key of Stiria. And then in the Emperors behalfe to request him to stretch forth his H helping handagainst this his mortal encury; who was now drawing al his power together into one head, to destroy him : having certainevnderstanding of his great preparation made tho. rowout all his dominions, to thrust him out of his, if in these extremities hee were not relieued by fuch Princes as could not in the end themselues avoid the last violence of these harms whereof he felt the first assaults. Which his Holinesse considering in the zeal of his denotion and by the increasing of the danger, he was in hope to find of it the like affistance in this his second need, that he had before received in his former affairs; the pretious balme of his denout charitie being of greater vertue than to serue but for one time, but being of sufficient power to serue for all ages, and all times of necessity. And that therefore he besought his Holinesse, to apply the same upon the present wound, seeing that without his help hee was more I like to perish than to liue. Whereunto the Pope answered, That his former actions alreadic passed spake enough for him in this action, to manifest his deuout meaning, so that it was needlesse for him to vse further words to expresse the same. That the great supplies both of men and money which he had fent forth for the good of the Christian commonweale, were the fure testimonies of his carefulnesse for the same. And albeit that these cuill haps had so far prevailed in Hungary, yet that he for his part had nevertheleffe still done what hee might for the remedying of those so great euils. And that now by the aduice of his honorable councellors there present, he had appointed an hundred and fifty thousand crownes to be paid towards the maintenance of the Christian army in Hungary this yeare, inhope to do more than that afterward for the Emperor in his wars against the Turks: whom God(as he said) suffered K to premaile vpon the Christians, not for any goodnesse that was in them, but for the chassising of the wickednesse of the Christians themselves.

Which fumme of an hundred and fifty thousand crowns was afterward according to a deerce made by the Pope and Cardinals, levied and paid of the tenths of the clergy throughout all Italy. And so Maximilian the Archduke most magnificently entertained and seased by the Pope, and by him rewarded with foure thousand crownes, having well dispatched the businesse he came for, returned againe vnto the Emperor his brother.

But as the Christian Emperor was thus carefull about his prouisions for the with standing of the Turks, they were not any whit behind him in augmenting of their forces for the inuading of him, And now the Tartars in great number being about to come unto their aid into I Hungary, being denied passage by the Polonians, had turned head towards Valachia, with a purpose by force and strong hand to get that of these weake people, with the power of the stronger had embarred them of. And so presuming upon their number, they entred into the same Province, which they all ouer rifled and spoiled at their pleasure. Where such of the countrey people as could escape their fury, fled into the townes, leaving their goods behinde them vnto their mercilesse rage, not with any thing to be satisfied. Rodolph the Vayuod himfelse as a man with fury dismaied, fled to Cronstat to George Basta: where he considering the danger he was now in, and that he was still to expect the like so often as the Tarrars were for the service of the Turke to come into Hungary; before Basta tooke a new oath of alleagance vnto the Emperor, folemnely protesting to die and liue in his seruice, necessity now inforcing M him to acknowledge his duty, and to seeke for the remedy of his harmes, which he had before oftent mes most proudly reie acd. Vpon which his fo humble submission, Basta receited him and his countrey into his protection.

in the meane time two traitours were brought to Claudinople, who having by wonderful crasse lus prised a strong castle belonging vnto a certaine great Ladie a widow, neere vnto a burrough called Carasebe, and risled and sacked the same, traiterously afterward sold it vnto the Turks, to the great hurt of the Emperors subjects neer vnto the place, and the no lesse advantage of the Turks. Whereof the Haiducks having gotten understanding, and cunning in such Builder for the Haiducks. matters, vpoor the fudden surprised the Turks by the way as they were comming to have taken possession of the place who seeing themselves too weake to withstand their enemies, & our of hope to faue themselues by slight, were there as men difmaied and appointed to be slaine, most of them by the Haiducks cut in pieces, and the rest taken prisoners. The two traitors being according to their deserts, for their shamefull treason most cruelly put to death, to the terg ror of others.

The Haiducks boding no houses but the fields nor other trade but their armes (spoyled of the one by the Turks, and armed with the other by necessitie) are alwaies in readinesse for setnice. In hope of profit pitristochem a pleasure to passe ouer the mountaines of ice, to travell thorow the storms of thunder and lightning, to swim ouer the deep ringrs, and to thrust themselues into a thousand dangeres which as it is no commendable kinde of life, so is the practise of it uniust, For as in this, so in solder their actions they spare neither friend not foe, all that comes in their way being subiect and as it were appointed to their fury : but especially when they want their pay, which affordeth unto them a thousand excuses for the robbing and spoyling of all, men without respect. With which maner of fury they were even at this time inrae ged for want of their pay, in such fort, as that if their right hands spoiled the Turkes, their left hands robbed the Chrastians: as vponone and the selfe same day they took from the Turkes of Agria a number of beafts and cattel, and rifled divers villages of the Christians. And not content with these outmages, meeting with an hundred or fix fcore waggons, laden with great ftore of victuals going toward Alba. Iulia, conducted by the Zeclers, fet vpon them, flew them that drove them, and carried away the Wagons with them. But these wrongs by Christians don unto Christians, quen the mortal enemies of the Christians, the Turks themselues reuenged. For the Turks of Temeswar having bin abroad toward Lippa, and found good store of booty, meeting with these sharks, were by them charged, not so much for that they were their enemies, or for the zeal of Christianitic, or for desire of honour, as for to get from them their D prey and booty. But the Turkes being in number twice as many as they, and withall well acquainted with fuch busines, were not so casily spoiled; but knowing their own strength, with their number oppressed their enemies, most of whom they slew, and tooke the rest prisoners:

God being as inft in his:punishments, as he is in his works powerfull, punishing the Wicked

by the weapons of others as wicked or rather worse than they. The Turks in the mean time while things thus passed, began again to fall to their old prachile, for the foliciting of a peace. But such phansies were too stale and common, any more to deceive the Christians withall 1 howbeit they yet gaue some ear thereunto, to discouer in their policie the commodities and inconveniences of the peace by them in thew offred, with a thousand protestations in their words, but far differing from their thoughts and deeds; who during the time of the parley, laboured in what they might to benefit themselnes and to hure vs. For even in that same very time they fortified their Townes and Castles with men and victuals : but especially the City of Buda, whereinto by a Conuoy of three thousand Turks come from Belgrade, they put an exceeding quantitic of all forts of necessary provision, fufficient to serve the same for an whole yeare. Besides that, it was certainly knowne by certaine Turks taken prisoners and brought to Possonium, That all this parley and treaty of peace was but of purpose seigned to put the Christians in securitie; for that the Bassa of Buda, who was the chiefe publisher of the same, had no such Commission from the great Sultan for the concluding of any peace in the absence of the Visier Bassa; vnto whom the Graund Seigniour had given charge, not to make any peace with the Emperour, but vpon condition, That hee should first deliuer vnto him the City of Strigonium; which if hee would not yeeld, that then he should besiege it, and by force take it from him; and after the winning thereof, to refuscall other treaty of peace, it being the only cause for which the Turkes desired peace. Of all which their double dealing and crafty designes the Emperour understanding, and whole-

ly resoluted forwar, presently sent County Sulfine with commission to Vienna, and appointed is George Basta Lieutenant General of his army into Hungary additing them carefully to looke vnto their charge, and not too much to trust into the glosing and flattering speeches of the ้า เรา เป็นและ และ rectoidul การ militar o med เรื่

Requir furpri- The Haiducks in the mean time alwaies in carmes, as having no other inheritance where on to live, ceased not still to looke abroad to finde that which was never lost. Now it form ned them in roaming abroad toward Belgrade, to light vpor Reonin a frong and fair Caffle of the Turks, wherein eight hundred of the Turkes fouldiers and other of their country peo. ple had their abode, together with the greatest part of their substanderd In the strength of which castle the Turks trusting and there lying in security; without further care of their fafe. ty, were voon the fudden before they were aware, by thefe adventurous men furprifed; who for half thrufting one another forward, at length carried the place, flew the greatest part of the Turks, and taking the reft prisoners, with a great and rich body returned to Lippa. The like exploit they of the garifon of Canifia attempted vpon the cafele and borough of Lambac. which they took and spoiled, and afterward fer it on fire : the flame wherof ferued for a fignal vnto the troups of County Serin, which passing that way, and tighting vpon the Tarker ours loded withithe spoils they had there taken, cut them in pieces, and so recovered from them theirbooty.

About this time, certaine of the garrifon fouldiers of Petrinia, hauling fectetly confoired with the Turks (by whom they were before correspond) to deliver vinco them that from Ca. file; and being about to have betrayed the fame by a Mine which they were in making vn. 1 der a stable neer vnto a store house wherein the pouder for the store of the Castle lay, with a purpose by firing of the same, to have given the Turks emance by the ruines thereof, who lay close hidden in a wood neer vnto the placet is fortuned this their wicked purpose to bee perceived by certain offenders then kept prisoners in the stable neer vnto the mine. Who has uing discovered the Traitours whole purpose, and in searce to be burned or blowne up by the tury of the Mine so neere vato them, discourred it vato the Gaoler, who made the Governour there with acquainted; by whose commandement they were forthwith apprehended, and beeing convicted of that their fo foule and heinous a treason, were with exemplary punishment executed.

Now as the Turks had oftentimes made thew as if they had bin defirous of peace to crafed k they not yet with great carnestnesseto solicit the same so that the Emperour, although her knew it to be a thing rather to be wished than hoped for ; yet lest he should seem carelesseof the common quiet of his subjects and people, and to refuse so great a good so oftentimes of fered him, now once again appointed certain personages of great place and authority, to attend the propositions of peace to be on the Turks behalf propounded to fwhich commission ners Cafar Gallen Sherif of Strigonium, an Italian, and a man of great experience in matters of state, was one. Whom the gouernor of Strigonium had of purpose fene to Pessi, to consider of fome good means for the concluding of apeace, whereif he himfelf had laid the first found dation; and understood that the Turks demands and pretensions not much diffred from those which they had many times before demanded . Whereof the first was I hat the Emperour L should for the time to come wel and truly pay vnto the great Sultan & his successors, all such tribute as he was wont to pay to the Turkish Sultans his predecessors; during the time of his leagues with them, and that without any demand to be therof made, The fecond, That the Emperor thould alwaies have his Embassadorlleger at the great Sultans court, with honourable presents, there to solicit the continuation of his love and friendship toward the Empefor his mafter. The third, That the Emperor should deliver vnto the Turks all the towns and Castles which he had taken from them either by force or by surprise, during the time of this war, together with the countries of Transylvania and Valachia. Vpon which demands granted, they promised to send a messenger vnto the great Sultan, in their names intreating him to surrender Canisia unto the Emperor, but not Agria, which they said they might innowise M deliner, except they were thereunto by force of arms constrained.

Vnto which their so proud and vnreasonable demands the Commissioners for the Empetor answered, That the Emperour long before this time had made peace with Sultan Selymu the second, and with Sultan Amurath the third, this Sultan Achmat his predecessors. An affured peace, fworn vnto and confirmed by all the just and folemn oatlies that could have been by any man defired : and for the more affurance thereof conceived into writing, and with the most authentique seals of their Majesties confirmed. Whereby both parties were most senerely and fireitly forbidden, one of them to attempt any thing against the other, or to encroch the one of them vpon the other during the time of fuch their League. And if so bee that contrary to the tenor thereof, either part (hould undertake to furprife any place belonging to the other, and so become masters thereof; that vpon the least request of the party so wronged, the places furprifed should be again forthwith restored, as vsurped vpon contrary to the publique faith, and the vsurpers to be seuerely for the same punished. And yet that the B Turkes notwithstanding thrusting by heapes beyond the barres of this fo strong and holy a League, had violated and broken the same, by surprising a number of places both in the high and lower countries of Hungary, neither giving eare vnto any speech or request that could bee made vnto them for restitution therof.

And yet not so contentented, had also taken a number of places from the Emperor in Sclavonia, between the rivers of Culp and Vnna: which places he had oftentimes by as just right redemanded, as they were by uniust forces usurped before the beginning of these wars. Demands esteemed instand reasonable even by the Turks themselves, and yet for all that, alrogetherreie Red by the great Sultans. Of which their fo great injustice the Emperor had oftentimes most justly complained, and so did even at this day, at the feeling of such his hurts c and harmes. And that the Emperour having by so many perfidious dealings made proof of the vntrustinesse of the Grand Seigniour his predecessors, what affurance then can hee conceiue of his fidelitie ? or vpon what foundation of faith can heebuild the fure building of peace, so much desired of him? And yet if he might hope so much of the faith of another man. as he is affured of his owne iust meaning, differing much from that of the grand Seigniours, (which he knew to be neuer answerable vnto his) that he for his part could be well contented to embrace the peace a prouided alwaies, that he might have Canifia and Agria yeelded vnto him. Or that if they would needs still hold those places, that he might likewise in peace hold the places that he had before won in that war, the reasons being on both sides alike. And that as concerning Transylvania, he could not deliuer that without betraying his owne right, D and the welfare of that province; having obtained the same as well by agreements and couenants between him and the fon of the last Duke Iohn, as by the free and voluntary releasement which Sigismund Bathor the last and immediat prince thereof, had not long before made vnto him. For the defence of which his rights, hee had spent many men and great summes of money, and all for the keeping of that prouince by force of arms, which by fo good right belon-

And that for Valachia, he could be content to yeeld fome part of his right vnto that prouince, so that the Turkes should cease from thenceforth to demand of him any more tributes or that he should as of ordinary duty send his Embassadors with yearely presents to the great Sultan, not being able without need to confent vnto fuch a needleffe fertitude; feeing that all E Princes ought to be at liberty, at their own choice to fend their Embaffadors, and not at another mans appointment.

Which answer of the Emperours Commissioners served no no other purpose but for the Turks to laugh and sport at, how iust and reasonable soeuer they were; still pressing them to yeeld vnto their vnreasonable demands, or else threatning to aduertise the great Sultan therof, who by force would take that from them, to their further loffe, which they refused to grant him by fair means to their own good. And so the Treaty was for that time broken off without any thing concluded. Which caused the Gouernour of Strigonium to retyre himselse backe againe vnto his Charge: yet for all that, leaving Cafar Gallen behind him, to entertaine it in so small hope as was thereof yet left. Who afterwards seeing it almost desperate, making a great feast vnto certaine of the chiefe of the Turkes of Buda, and having in that mertiment drawne from them a promife to fine as friends with them of the garrifon of Petth and of other places which lay neere ento that Towne, he retyred himfelf afterwards ento Strigo. nium alfo.

Thebase com- Shorely after whose departure, Lagenreuter Gouernour of Petth, notwithstanding the late G artife of the promifes of the Turks at Buda, for their liuing by him in peace & amity; and the affured promile of Cafar Gallen, at his last departure, for the speedy furnishing of the town both with men and all things necessary for the defence thereof, which he ought with great affurance to have expected; yet dismaied with the report of the comming of Hassan Bassa the Turkes Generall with his great army, and that by the fireit commandement of the great Sultan, he was to be gin his conquests in Hungary with the winning of Pesth; as a man afraid of his own shadow, thought good betime to prouide for himfelfe; and vpon that refolution, having yet feen nognemy at all to force him, truffing vp his baggage, the fift of September forfooke the Towne, with fine Companies of footmen and fix Troupes of horsemen following him: a sufficient number to haue for a time desended the Towne, and endured a siege, especially in so strong H a place and fowell prouided both of victuals and munition. All which, this cowardly Go. uernour (but most vnworthy of that name) left together with his honour for a preyvnto his Enemies; having yet before his departure out of the Towne, caused the principal buildings thereof to be undermined, and barrels of gun pouder to be layd under them, where they were shortly after all ouerthrown, and most part of the towne burnt. But being gone not past half a league from the place, he met with four hundred Haiducks, all well armed, whom the Gouemour of Strigonium had fent for the reliefe of Pesth, with a number of boats loded with corn.munition, and other necessaries of all sorts, for the better assurance of the place, and the performing of the promise before to the same end made by the Gouernor of Strigonium, Which Hungarian Haiducks meeting with these dismayed Cowards upon the way, thought 1 it not the best way to go any further, as thinking themselves not able to doe that with their fo fmall a number, which the other durst not undertake with their far greater: wherefore joyning themselves with the other fearfull Fugitives, they with them returned to Strigonium: leaving their Vessels and munition vnto their enemies, who immediately after seised vpon

The next day after, the mines having taken their effect, the Turks wondring to fee so great and terrible a fire in Pesth, which stil more and more increased, there being none that went about to quench it aduentured to come ouer the river from Buda, and to draw neer to the town now all on a light fire, which finding abandoned & for faken by the Christians, they diligently quenched, and repaired the ruines of the wall, and fo without any loffe became Masters of K the fame.

lagenreuter the cowardly late gouernor, with his fearful troups in the mean time comming to Strigonium, and by the Gouernor examined of the causes of his flight, & of the so shamefull leaving of his charge; and beeing able to alledge no other cause or reason, but the great bruit or report of the Visier Bassa's comming with his army to besiege the towner was therefore committed to prison, and there reserved to be afterward justly punished for his disloyaltie and cowardise.

The Bassa of Buda by the Gouernors cowardise thus possessed of Pesth, by letters excused himself to the governor of Strigonium for the taking therof, the treaty of peace being not as yet quite broken offialledging for himself (as the truth was) that he had taken it as a placeby L the Christians voon a vain fear for saken and desperatly set on fire, without any such cause gi uen them by him or any of the Turks. And further, offered vnto the governor, if he so pleased, to deal with him for the exchange of prisoners on both sides taken offering to exchange one for another. And as for the concluding of the peace, so oftentimes intreated of, and even yet in hand, that he for his part was wonderfull desirous it might be fully concluded and ended, before the arrivall of Hassan with his Army in Hungarie: for that he being once come, there would then be no time amidst the noise of so many weapons, and so many men of Warre, to Haffan the Visier Bassa was now for all that already entered into Hungary, drawing after after him a world of men, and was come towards Sexart. For the viewing of which army the M Gouernor of Palantwar going forth with an hundred horsemen, by cuill hap changed before hee was aware, vpon the sudden to meet with five hundred Turkes, by the Bassa himselfe likewise sent forth to discouer the Countrey and the passages therof; by whom hee charged

A and with the multitude of his enemies oppressed, was himself staken prisoner, most of his men being in that conflict flaine, some few of them that were left aline by speedy flight hardly efcaping. Which cuill hap on the Christians side, was forthwith recompenced with the better fuccelle of the County Serin, who falling upon three hundred Turks neere unto Sigeth, being in number scarce halfe so many as them, yet set vpon them with such courage, that giving them no leifure to confider of the weakenesse of his forces, they were by them ouerthrowne and cut in pieces, before they were well aware of him.

But together with the time of the yeare, to come vnto the maine point of these present warres in Hungary: the Turks finding themselves ont of hope by any capitulations or treaties of peace, to regaine the strong towne of Strigonium out of the hands of the Christians, were now resolved to employ the vetermost of their forces for the obtaining of the same: with a thousand protestations, That it by force of armes and strong hand they should gaine the place, they would neuer more have peace with the Christians. At which their vain threats and speeches, the Christians before resolutely set downe for the defending of the place by them so much desired, and well acquainted with their great brags, could not but with scorne fmile, as men nothing, therewith difmaied, nor fo to be remoued. Neuertheleffe the Baffa constant in his resolution for the regaining of Strigonium, with all his forces came the eighteenth day of September and laied fiege vnto it. Now vnto this fiege the Turks, in hope of strigonium bespoyle and boory, came flocking from all places, as it bad beene to some great Mart; and the fried by the folds in all the Country thereabout were conserved and swarmed with armes men brokes and Takto fields in all the Country thereabout were concred and swarmed with armes, men, horses, and c tents. They encamped neere vnto Charles his hill, taking vp with their tents halfe a league of the Country round about : and at their first comming most brauely advanced their Ensignes with their halfe Moones, the arms of their stil encreasing Empire, Whom the besieged in this action imitated, brauely aduancing their Enfignes voon their walls, as did the Turks in the fields and further brauing and provoking them with a thousand thundering shot, discharged out of the Towne among fi them. All the wall round about the Towne gliftered with armes and flames of fire, out of which the deadly bullets flew, carrying with them death and terrour into the middest of these new come enemies, for their welcome. The Turks neverthelesse came still resolutely on, and as men prodigall of their lines even in the middest of so many dangers, began to make their approches. Vpon whom the Christians with great courage falli The christians D ed forth, to disturbe them in their works, and so for the space of certaine houres having had filly forth up. with them an hot and sharpe skirmish, without any great hurt received, retired againe into the towne, leaving vnto their enemies by that they had done, a good testimony of their valor and refolution. The Turks for all that lodged themselves, made their trenches, and so encamped before the mount of Saint Thomas, where by the placing of their cannon, they well declared their meaning for the battering of that fort.

Against which their defignes, George Basta, Licutenant General of the Imperial army, right Thecarefullenrefolutely opposed himselfe, having neere vnto Strigonium cast vp a strong fort, well fernish. deserted and and areas are the superior of B. start and with man and areas are the superior of the Emproure ed with men and great artillery, from which he greatly annoied the Turks with his great ord- Litutenant Genance, and with the fury thereof enforced them to remoue farther off with their approches: "neall, for the E his army upon the river of Danubius in the meane time lying betwirt the Isle of Strigonium, strigonium, and the old towne of the Rascians, to keep the enemy from entering either into the one place

And that as for himselfe, his honour together with his life, were so bound vnto his grave and sepulchre, at the foot of the wals of that place, as that they could not be from the same separated 3 having proposed the glory of the preservation of that place, or else of an honourable death, as the end of all his actions, and consummation of all his hopes. And that therefore he most earnestly belought them to follow his so honourable a purpose, in assisting him in that action, so much concerning their lines and honour, and whole ly depending of their courage and resolution. And that for testimony of his earnest desire to the furthering of this service, he was willing to depart with a good part of his substance and treasure, to be bestowed vpon them, amiddest these the trophies of his honour, having com. Now the Turks having a purpose easily to begin the conquest of Strigonium by the ta. king of the ftrong fort of Saint Thomas, came the foure and twentieth day of September to A notable fally affault and batter the same: vpon whom five hundred horsemen, and two thousand footmen of the chriftian fallying out of the fort, caused them, after a tharpe and bloudy conflict, and not without some losse on both sides, to retyre backe againe, and to forsake the mount whereupon they were encamped. But in pursuing of them too farre, they fell into a great ambush, before by the Turkes for that purpose layed to entrap them; where betwixt them was fought a most sharpe and bloudy fight; the Turks presuming upon their multitude, and the Christians standing I vpon their valour and honour. Vntill that in fine, valour by number being oppressed, seuen hundred of the Turks being slaine, the Christians were enforced to retire, having lost about an hundred of their men, and amongst them the valiant County Casimir of Hohenloth, for whose dead body there was a notable fight betwire the Christians and the Tutks t not much unlike unto that which the Poet Homer describeth, to have been sought betwirt the Trojanes and the Greekes, for the body of Patroclus. Howbeit that at length the Christians being ouercharged with the comming on of the whole army of the Turks, were glad (as I faid) to retire, and so to leave the dead body of the County Casimir in the power of their mercilesse enemies; who as dogs which reuenge themselues upon the stones which are cast at them, being not able to bite the hands of them that threw them, fo did they vpon the body of this gentle K Knight, by cutting off his nose and cares, and afterwards his head. But within some few daies after, this body so disfigured was againe deliuered vnto the Christians for a Turke of good account, who was about that time by them taken prisoner. At which time the Turks seemed to be very desirous of peace, most earnestly requesting County Fredericke of Hohenloth (the flaine Counties brother) not to be an hinderer thereof. Howbeit that this was but one of their old practiles, depending still vpon vnreasonable conditions, whereof the yeelding vp of Strigonium was one of the chiefest, as the place by them most defired.

But if this fiege of the Turks availed them not against the place belieged, yet was it profitable for them against another place by them not artempted, which was the strong Towns of Hatwan, more subject vnto feare, without any danger, than was Strigonium unto the bullets L and battery of the Turks, with just cause of distrust. For the souldiers which lay there in garrison, terrified with the siege of Strigonium, and doubting lest the Turks leaving that siege, should come and besiege them, trussing up their bag and baggage, the ninetcenth of September abandoned the place, and carrying away with them the best of the great ordnance, lest the rest altogether with the place, and great store of prouision, vnto the enemy, not in hope of any

The bruit of the fiege of Strigonium had called thither all the forces of both parties in Hungary, and the Countries thereabouts, on the one fide for the winning thereof, and on the other for the defence of the same. Amongst others, the County of Tambier, Gouernour of Lippa, was about to have gone thither with certaine of his troups to have aided the Generall, M for the preservation of the place. But in the meane time Bethlem Haber, chiefe of the rebels in Transylvania, affisted by Beckheres Baffa with foure thousand Turks enterd into the Province, to have made himselfe master thereof under the protection of the Turke. Whereof the

A County having got knowledge, refolued to go and meet him, and to encounter him at the ve- Bublem II show ry first enterance of him into the Province. This old Rebell knowing that George Baffa was the Robell furby the Emperours appointment gone out of the country with the best troups of his horiemen, three neby the the greatest strength of the Prouince, came on in great security, thinking of nothing but of county Tamvictory, and of performing his intended exploit, without feare of any to let him: fo that casting no further perill, he was surprised by the County, before he was aware, and put to slight. Neither was the fight long betwixt men accustomed to vanquish, resolutely set downe, and well armed, against men dasmaied, halfe naked, and surprised. In which conslict aboue a thousand of them being flaine, and a thousand of horses of service taken, the rest sted; amongst whom Bethlin himfelfe with the Baffa flying, were glad by fwimming to faue themfelues amiddeft a R thousand chances and dangers of their lives.

The Baffa of Temeswar advertised of this overthrow by one of them that was fled from Success sentite the fame, presently he sent forth his Lieutenant with a good number of men, to relieue the storeteles the vanquished Turkes: Who by the way understanding of the generall ouerthrow of them war, descated whom hee was sent forth to relieue, as also of the strength of his enemies, and that hee was by the County come too late to the reliefe of his friends, retired as fast as he could with his men backe againe homeward toward Temeswar. But being in their retreat discouered, and hotly pursued by these men imbrued with the bloud of their enemies, and yet breathing with victory, they were by them ouertaken euen almost at the gates of their City, and there (as men before ouercome with feare, and ouerwhelmed with despaire) cut in pieces, without any fight or resi-C stance by them made, beseeming men of their sort, the Lieutenant himselfe being there slaine

After which exploits done, the County turning towards Iula, chanced to light vpon certaine companies of Turks loaded with booty, which they had got in roaming abroad into the Countrey thereabout, whom he pursued euen vnto the gates of the towne, which they found thut against them; for that they within the towne feeing the Christians even at the heeles of their companions, had thut their gates, neither durst now open the same, for searc lest the Christians should together with them enter the towne, and so become masters thereof. Who so that out by their owne friends, were there all by the Christians slaine, even in the fight of their companions, not daring to let them in, nor able to relieue them. After which maffacre D done, the Christians not yet so contented, burnt the suburbs of the towne, and so loaded with the spoiles of their enemies, departed. The County after so many honourable exploits in a small time performed, returned to Lippa, where he arrived the 25 of September, and from thence afterward aduertising Basta the Emperours Lieurenant Generall, of these his exploits don , caused ten of the Turk's Enfignes, all stained with their owne bloud, to be presented vnto him as the fure tokens of his good servine done.

But to returne againe vnto the fiege of Strigonium, the greatest exploit by the Turks entended for this yeare, from which we have from the occurrent of the same time a little strayed. The Visier Bassa perceiuing by the valiant and resolute desence of our men, how little hee prevailed in this fiege, and that it was like enough to tend at length to his dishonour, E thought it good once againe to prooue, if hee might by composition gaine that which hee was now almost out of hope by force to obtaine. And to that purpose caused a motion to be made vnto the belieged, for a treaty to be had concerning a peace, and a day appointed for the same. Vnto which motion for peace the Imperials (although they had no hope at all, of any peace to be concluded) easily yeelded, lest they might bee thought obstinately to have rejected the same. Whereupon Commissioners were on both sides appointed, to meet together, to conferre of the matter. And fo for the Emperour Althem himfelfe, with Ferdinand Collonitz, and Fredericke of Hohenlo, County of Rhene, were appointed neere unto the Rascian Towne to meet with the Turks Commissioners, to heare what they would say. Howbeit the Commissioners on both sides beeing met at the place aforesaid, all their conference F was but vaine and to no purpose; the Turkes still viging the yeelding up of Strigonium, and the Imperials as earnestly refusing the same. So that the treaty for peace being broken off, and the Commissioners departing, the siege was more cruelly by the Turks continued than before.

Now there were in the Turks army lying at the fiege, certaine companies of Coffackes, G men for their pay indifferent to ferue any Prince of what Religion focuer. Which feruiceable men for their pay incline control to the state of september, by night to for fake the Turks campe, and to come vnto the Christians, Of which their purpose and designe the Visier Bassa having by some vntrusty amongst them got knowledge, caused the sootmen of these companies to be apprehended and flaine; the horsemen in the meane time making themselues way ouer the bellies of such as would have staied them, sled, and escaped, some of them to Komara, and some to Dotis. Threescore of these Cassocks being by the Turks hardly pursued, adnentured to swim ouer Danubius, and so all naked came to Collonitz, by whom they were courthe trained and apparelled. And within three daies after, two hundred horsemen moe of the same Cossackes came to Colloniz also: who marching in good order vnto the head of H the Christian campe, were there swornevnto the Emperours seruice; and in token of their loyalty, there discharged their pistols thrice. Which horsemen Collonisz divided among the rest of his troups, as having before time had good experience of the courage and good service of divers such others of their fellowes.

By these sugitive soldiers it was understood, that the Ianizaries in great number up in mutiny against the Visier Bassa, would have ensorced him to have raised the siege, and so to have departed. The cause of their so great discontentment (as they pretended) was the manifest and affured danger of their lines, with little or no hope at all for the gaining of the place: They themselves being still exposed to the dangers both of the siege and of the field, having the besieged on head of them armed with an assured resolution, and the Christian army at 1 their backes, of knowne valour and experience. Besides that, the place it selse was (as they faid) impregnable, being at all times to be relieued, by reason that it commanded over the Danuby, which might alwaies relieue it both with men and victuals. And that thereforeafter that they had satisfied their honour, by giving an assault or two vnto the fort of Saint Themas, they had resolved to arise, and to be gone. And much about this time, viz, thenine and twentieth of September, in the night time, was a most dreadfull fiery impression seene in fashion much like a Rainebow, of a stery red colour, which beginning ouer Cockera, and rising higher over Strigonium, at length vanished away over the fort of Saint Thomas. The fight whercof much troubled the beholders thercof, as well the Christians as the Turkes: such frange meteors and apparitions being oftentimes the presages of the ruine of them to whom K they appeare.

In the meane time whilest the Turks thus lay before Strigonium, at the siege of Saint Themas fort, the Lord Basta, Lieutenant Generall of the Emperours forces, to give the Turks to understand, how that he was alwaies in readinesseto attend upon their doings, and to take hold of all such opportunities as should by them be offered, and so to keepe them in suspence, came with seuen thousand braue horsemen, and shewed himselfe in the plaine field in order of battell; fo, as it were, brauing the Turks even vnto their owne trenches: where haning difcharged their pistols thrice, they returned as victorious, alwaies keeping themselues in order, as men ready either to give or to accept of battell. Howbeit the Turks for the present keeping themselues close within their trenches, mooued not; but afterwards being desirous to coun- L ter-braue this the Christians presumption, the third day of October they came forth of their trenches, and gaue a second assault to Saint Thomas fort, imploying the vetermost of their The mais agains power in this action, whereupon they well knew a great part both of their honour and of their fafety to depend. But in affayling the fort they met with them as resolutely set downe for the desence thereof, and for the maintenance of their honour, as were they for the winning of the same. So the assault was begun with great fury and adventure, as was the other before: howbeit that it endured not long, for that the Turks fought rather for the discharge of their duty, and to have some just cause to raise their siege, than for any hope they had to prevaile, orto carry the place. For it befell them according as they had expected, so that after that the fight had endured little more than halfe an houre, amiddest the tempests of armes and fury, in M fine the Turks out of hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the siege, and retired, having in that consider lost fine hundred of their best souldiers.

The Gouernour of Strigonium had in the city under his charge fix thousand Hiaduckes,

A who attainted with treason and feare, all sorsooke the place excepting fine hundred, preferring their lines vnworthy the fauing, before their duty, and the life and honour of their Generall. With which shamefull treason, and the resolution of the great Bassa for forcing of the place, the Germanes there left, seeing their Captaines dismaied, gathered themselves together, promiting by their own valour, to supply what wanted by reason of the trechery of the others, offering themselves to be sworne againe vnto the service of the Emperour, and rather to die all in the place, than to yeeld it up unto the Turks, or to leave it unto their enemies: where by their generall confent a folemne decree was made, that who focuer hee were which should speake or once make mention of yeelding the Towne, should forthwith therefore be hanged upon a gibbet. The Turks although they had now in two affaults been twice The fore of s. B repulled, came yet forth once againe the fifth day of October, and affaulted Saint Thomas the third came affaulted.

fort the third time : wherein they failed not to doe what they might, but were by the Chris fauted. flians therein fo received, that despairing of the winning thereof, they with great losse and fhame retired. Which difgrace caused them to returne to their old practifes, for the taking of places by policy. For having in many places undermined the walls, and filled them with gunpouder, they were in hope by that meanes to haue opened them clues a way unto their conquest. Of which their hope for all that, they were deceived : for the Christians hauing perceiued their meaning, did by countermining not only frustrate their endeanour, but carried away the pouder also, which they had before laied in the mines, reserving it to their owne further necessity and vie. Wherefore the Turks seeing themselves of thir hope decei-C ued, returned againe vnto their old practifes, to come to a parly for peace. Of which their motion the Christians nothing disliked. But the Commissioners on both sides being met together for that purpose, in a little Island beneath Strigonium, when as the Turkes had offered vnto the Christians the City of Agria for Strgonium; or if so be that that exchange pleased them not, but that they would needs keepe the City of Strigonium still, that then in confideration of the peace, they should deliver vnto them the strong Townes of Fileck, Saint Setschin, Pallanke, and Nouigrade, both of which demands were very vnreasonable: The Commissioners thereupon againe departed without concluding of any thing.

Now the army of the Turkes was in it felfe diverfly divided with quite contrary defites; D the Visier Bassawith some other of the Commanders, stood stifly for the taking of the place, as men willing either to returne from thence with victory, or elfe there to end their daies : but the lanizaries to the contrary, were as earnest to be gone, and to raise the siege, deeming it impossible then to preuaile against a place so strong, so well manned, and so easily to be still relieued. With which their refolution so contrary vnto his, the Baffa enraged, and ver propofing before his departure to proue the vetermost of his forces against the fort now already by him thrice before affaulted, the tenth of October gaue thereunto fix great affaults, but The fire of s. with like successe as before, finding there still the same defendants, no white discouraged, but times in one armed with their accustomed resolution. For the defendants encouraged by their most va- day assaulted, liant commanders, with such surv repulsed the Turks, that they were glad to give over affault E vpon affault, and with great loffe of their men to retire. Their often retreats also being vnto them no leffe hurtfull than were their affaults, the deadly bullets being out of their fort dif charged upon them like showers of haile. So that the Bassa now after so many assaults, out the size of of all hope to gaine the fort, and still pressed by the Ianizaries for the raising of the siege, im. Scripenium at mediatly after rose with his army, quitted his trenches, and retired with his campe neere vn. to a castile, about a league distant from Strigonium. From whence the Turks the better to couer their dishonour, and to hinder the Christians from pursuing of them in their retreat, the next day after came into the field with a good part of their army, and shewed themselves before the Rascian Towne, and there skirmished with the Christian Haiduckes. Which manner of skirmishing for all that was more in shew, than in effect, neither party therein re-F ceining any great loffe or hurt. In the meane time, the befreged which were in Strigonium, having gotten certaine knowledge, that the enemy had already removed his cannon and other prouision for the siege backe againe into Buda, in token of joy discharged all their great Ordnance out of the city and the fort; by the report thereof giving knowledge vinto Mmmmm 2 the other townes and castles of the Christians, of their deliuerance. Of which so commona G joy euery one of them were partakers, as deliuered from some part of the seare which the siege of 10 great a city as was Strigonium, had brought vpon them. And so the siege of Strigoni. um, begun the eighteenth day of September, was by the Turks given ouer the thirteenth of October: the lanizaries infolently threatening to have flaine the great Baffa their Generall.

Baffaparfuetb

Basta the Emperors Lieutenant in the meane time awaiting all opportunities, failed not to the Turks army departing from take hold of fo fit an occasion, but with his horsemen following after the Turks army, slew of the first of Stri- them a great number, and tooke some other of them prisoners. And afterward returning vnto their campe, found it void of men, but full of bullets, with certain pieces of great ordnance. which the Turks had left there, having not time to remove the same to Buda. Vponthisti. H fing of the Turks army the Commanders thereof were diverfly affected vnto the scruice that was further to be done, as they had before been in the time of the fiege. Such of them as lay in Hungary or necre therunto, desiring still to hold the field, in hope of the spoile of the country: but they which dwelt farther off, especially such as were come out of Asia, desiring as much to be discharged, their horses being almost all dead with faintnesse and travell, and themselues weary of the seruice.

Shortly after the rifing of the Turks army from Strigonium, two fugitiues of the Turks most brauely mounted, camevnto Basta the Emperors Lieutenant, and presenting him with a ring of great value, and a most faire Turkish Ensigne, told him, most part of the Turks army to lie then incamped in the country neere vnto Pesth; and the great Cham, a young Prince I of about twenty yeares old to be come thither with a great power of Tartars, to aid the Baffa: And that the Turks by their comming incouraged, were determined yet to make a great excursion for the spoiling of the country. All which shortly after was certainely knowne to be true, the plaine country of the upper Hungary about Palanka, Setschin, and Villecampe, being by them, but especially of these new come Tartars, all spoiled and burnt. For temedy whereof Sigefride Collonitz Oppoling himselse with his Hungarian horsemen, against these in. folent forragers, fo danted them, that ceafing further to spoile the country, they departed, casrying away with them such prisoners and spoile as they had there taken, and leaving behind them a strong garrison of three thousand good souldiers, for the repairing and keeping of Pesth, but a little before cowardly (as we said) by the Christians forsaken. But within some K few daies after, viz. the foure and twentieth of October, the Visier Bassa by his letters writtenento County Althem Gouernour of Strigonium, made a mention for a treaty of peace to be had for the comfort of the distressed people of that spoiled country, solemnly protessing, most religiously on his part to keepe the same, if it should be once concluded and yet in the meane time with fire and sword spoiling all the Countrey by the way as he departed out of Hungary.

New rebellion

But now as this poore Country began to feele reliefeby the departure of the great Baffa raifed by 181. with his army out thereof, so the Country of Transylvania joyning thereunto, was at the was, forward same time as much with rebellion and discord distressed. Bethlin Habor the Rebell, with his Baffa ouerthrowne and driven out of Transylvania (as is aforefaid) the Lord Belgiesa, Baffahis L Lieutenant in this prouince, thinking all things now at quiet, was making himfelf ready with his troups, to have gon to aid the Lord Basta his General, then incamped in the plains of Strigonium, to hinder the Turks designes for the taking of this Towne. But as he was about so to haue done, behold, euen at the same time when he least feared, a second Rebell there started up far worse than the first, namely, the Lord Istinan (otherwise surnamed Bossean, or more Hereat in form truely * Possicay) who accompanied with great troups of men of warre under the protection of which in the Turke and Ailing himselfe by the name of the Prince of Transylvania, entering that Pro-Estemian las uince, miserably burnt and spoiled the same. For the repressing of which so sudden a rebelgauge Eguifieth lion, Belgiofa with a thousand horse, under the leading of Rotkeuitz and Peter Lasta, marched totarry of (a)) of ward Veradin: and with his troupe comming to Ador, a country village about a league di-M bet by was of stant from Veradin, and meaning thither to assemble together his army, he sent to Petsie Godiffract bid uernour of Veradin, to puthim in minde of his duty, and to craue his aid. Which valiant capin the emperors taine, alwaies prest and ready to do his Prince service, failed not now of his duty, but calling

A together fix companies of footmen out of Romosa, and joyning vnto them source companies out of Veradin, together with the Silesian horsemen of Schuet Kenhut his Regiment) whom by reason of his sickenessa he was not able to lead) and with them the Haiduckes of County Tambier, came vnto the place of the rendezuous, bringing with him all warlike prouision in token of his fidelity. With this army Belgiosa marched against the Rebels, who as resolute men attended his comming : for why, Botfeay knowing the Haiduckes of County Tambier fecretly to fauour him and his rebellion more than they did Belgiofa and his just quarrels, stood innofiare of them, but affured himselse of them as of his friends; who sailed not of his hope and expectation, but even at the first joyning of the battell, turned themselves to his partiwith the going ouer of whom, the number of the Rebels was much encreased, and Belgiosishis po-

B wer both in force and courage much weakened, feeing themselues at once exposed both vnto the force of their enemies, and to the trechery of their fellowes, who now with conjoyned forces most ficrcely affailed them: who finding themselves now on all sides invironce with so great a multitude, and not able with fo small a number as was left, to with stand the violence of their enemies, and the treason of their companions; after they had to the vttermost of their Belgiofa in a power performed all the parts of valiant and couragious men, were there almost all cut in excitoring pieces, and there buried in the field of their loyalty, honoured with their owne bloud, and all by nuclear together embrued with the bloud of their enemies. In this value ky and difloyall fight were divers good and faithfull Captaines slaine : Perfie Gouernour of Veradin, and Pallas Lippa, both great Captaines, and grieuously wounded, were there taken prisoners. The Lieutenant C of Peifie alfo, having retired himfelfe with some of his troups into a place of good strength, there fo valiantly defended themselves, that Botscay out of hope to overcome them by force, to get them into his power promised them upon his Oath, if they would yeeld themselues, to suffer them in sasety to depart. But what trust or credit is to be given to him who hath before broken his faith and loyalty to his Prince, this Rebellwell shewed by the death of these valiant and warlike men, who after that they had vpon his faith and promise yeelded themselues, were by his appointment cruelly slaine and cut in pieces. The Silesian horsinen were there also ouerthrowne and buried in the middest of their enemies : and as for nelgiofa himselse, he strangely escaped out of the battell, and faued himselse by slying to Veradin. The Victorious Rebell after the battell, in stead of praising God, sacrificed to the Diucil, by D fending a great part of the Enfignes by him gained, to the Vifier Baffa, with a thousand prai-fes of his glory, for supporting him in his rebellion; and vaunting much of this his victory, gaue him withall to understand, That he had slaine about 6000 of his enemics.

This victory gotten, together with the humble submission of Bosseay, obtained of the Great Bosseay in bis Sultan, That from thenceforth he should be stiled by the name of the Prince of Transylva- retains cause nia, with a further charge from him, to do the vttermost of his endeasour for the subduing Great Sultan, unto his obeyfance the rest of Transyluania; promising plentifully to supply his wants both and called with men and mony, and out of hand to fend him three thousand Tartars to his aid. And in filance deed this was a sound and the filance of trans. deed this was a very great and bloudy battell, fought from the first breake of the day, vntill eleuen a clocke at noone: but whether fo many were flaine there or no, it cannot certainely

E betold, for that divers of them who were faid to be flaine, and fo accounted among the dead, had hid themselues in the wood thereby, and some others of them by some other meanes escaped death alfo. Petsie himselse had with him when he was taken two Monkes, whom the souldiers in despight cut into many pieces, and carried him fast bound in chains to Derritza, to be there cured of the dangerous wounds by him in the battell received.

But as for Pallas Lippa, who being wounded, was taken prisoner with Petfie, becwas afterwards by Rosseay appointed his Lieurenant Generall, and so by his commandement was publipuely proclaimed, as he which was defirous to take vpon him the defence of the reformed Religion, and of such as were willing to prosesse the same : who forthwith made a generals proclamation, That all they which were defirous of the liberty of conscience, and to line free from the fuperstitions of the Roman Church, should repaire vnto him as vnto their head and chiesetaine, ready to entertaine them, and to allow to enery one of them fine Dollars a month for their pay. Vpon which Proclamation made, a great multitude of men upon the fudden reforted vnto him; fo that in a short time he had following of him ten thousand Haiduckes, beside a number of the other common rascall people; yea, almost all the gentlemen of the G country repairing vnto him, bound themselves by oath to him, and one of them to another, That as they would not take vp armes to fight against the Christian Emperor, so they would not fubmit themsclues vnto the Turke, but only stand vpon the defence of their religion, and the liberty of confcience.

The Rebell Bosfeay thus wonderfully encreased in strength and number, beset almost all the pathages of the country, and with the fword of rebellion in his hand, and his fouldiers following him, commanded the cities ftill as he went to yeld vinto him; but hearing that Belgiofa The great dity was after the late ouerthrow gone from Veradin to Cassouia, where his wife lay; and being of collective come thither, to have been by the citisens rejected, who would not only not receive him into their city, but turned his wife also out of their city vnto him; he with a great army comming H thicher, tooke the City without resissance, the Citisens for the most partenclining vato him. Of which City beeing possessed, hee forthwith changed both the Religion and ci. uile gouernment thereof, flew part of such as were of the Romish Religion, and thrust the rest out of the City, with all the Church men, tooke the Bishop and the Emperours Treafuror prisoners, and so changed the whole gouernment of the Towne vpside downe. The onely man he stood in feare of, was Belgiofa, for whom he laid wait by all meanes hee could to have taken him, with a purpose to have vsed him most hardly, if hee had fallen into his

These things thus done in Transyluania and in Hungary, the Visier Bassa being about to returne to Constantinople, to grace that little which he had done this yeare in Hungary, and I to avoid the sufpition of his cuill successe in that Province, borrowed of Busican the rest of the Enfignes, together with Petfie and other the noble Christian captines which he had taken in the late battell with Belgiofa: which Enfignes and prisoners he confidently afterwards caufed to be presented unto the Great Sultan debmat, as taken by himselfe; and in recompence thereof, left three thousand Turks and Tartars with the Rebell, to aid him in his wars both in

Baffa the Emperours Lieutenant in Hungary, and Gouernour of Transyluania, hearing of the stirres and troubles of late raised in both those Countries, by Botseay and his rebellious Followers, and having as he thought best, set all things in order agains at Strigonium, marched thence with his Army, being foureteene thousand strong, towards Cassonia, with a K purpose to have suppressed the rebellion in the vpper Hungary, before it should have spred farther, to the endangering of the whole state of both those Countries, as afterward it did. Howbeit before he could come thither, the Rebels after the taking of Caffouia, being wonderfully encreased both in strength and number, had taken in most of the strong Townes and places in the vpper Hungary, the people almost generally now favouring their quarrell, carrying with it the face of Religion, with the suppressing of the German government, both settinfa in the things voto them much pleasing. And now hearing that Belgiosa (a man of them most hated, beeing, as we faid, thut out of Cassouia) was fled into the Cassle of Zipze, they by Letters required of Turson Captaine of the Castle, to have him delivered vnto them, to be according to his deferts punished; promising withall, to doe Turson himselfe no harme, so L that hee would take part with them in defence of their Religion, and of the liberty of conscience: which if hee should refuse to doe, yet that they would give him free liberty to depart whither hee would, out of his Castle, and in safety to conduct him thither, so that he would forthwith resolue, what course h. e would take. But if hee should of this his offer mislike also, then they threatened to spoyle his Countrey, to kill his people, to rafe his Castle, and to make himselfe an example vnto others. Wherewith for all that hee nothing mooued, refused to deliver vnto them Belgiofa, the man whom they so much defined, or yet to accept of any of their other offers. Whereupon the Rebels with great labour repairing the broken way betwixt Cassouia and the Castle, and bringing certaine pieces of great Ordnance from Cassonia, in great number came and streightly belieged the Casse. M With whose attempts the valiant Captaine nothing mooned, with his thundering shot out of the Castle so welcommed them, that having thereby received great harme, they thought it not their best course to stay any longer there with so great a power, but with the greatest

A part thereof to go to Presburg, to reforme that city and fome other places by the way; perfuading themselues, That the Captaine of this castle so shut vp, and on enery side beset with his enemies, would at length of himselfe yeeld vo the castle.

But while the Rebels thus lay at the fiege of this castle, certaine companies of them went to have taken the spoile of a Religious house there by : but comming thither, and breaking open the doores, and fearching enery fecret corner of the house, they found therein nothing worth the reckoning of but fo returned almost empty handed : for the Priests had for feare of them before carried away with them all the best of their goods and substance into the besieged caltle. And so likewise the rife report of their comming to Presburg flying abroad, almost all the Priests and Iesuits in Presburg and the country thereabout, leaving their Churches R and Colledges, fled with their fub stance to Vienna, scarcely accounting themselves safe there, untill that the garrison of that strong city was increased with a new supply of fix hundred good fouldiers.

And now the Rebels, their number still more and more encreasing, and having set all the voper part of Hungary on a broyle, were befieging divers other caffles and ftrong places, yet holden for the Emperor; when as Basta in the meane time, comming from the siege of Strigonium, came and with his army encamped about three miles from Filek. Of whose comming the Rebels hearing, and thereupon retyring, he forthwith followed after them toward Budnoc, which castle they also left, and so neere vnto Ramosambat, the place of their rendezuous, gathered together a great number, with an intent to have given Basta battell. Whereof Basta hauing knowledge, to spare the effusion of more Christian bloud, by an Herauld sent unto them infriendly and courteous manner, advised them to change their minds, and to returne againe vnto their former allegiance. But finding them obstinately set downe in their sormer purpose, for the maintaining of their rebellion, and the giuing of him battel, he marching forward with his army with great force charged certaine companies of the Rebels, appointed to keepe the paffage of Filek; who at the first right valiantly received the charge, and defended the paffage, untill that at length with number oppressed, and aboue source hundred of them slaine, they were put to the worfe, and enforced to flee; in which flight, among it others there taken prifoners, Blase Nemet their captain was taken also, whom Basta caused to be hanged up by the heels, with the Enfignes fet up about him which he had taken from the rebels in the late fight, and D after he had for a time so bung, made him to be taken downe, and his head to be strucke off from his shoulders. In this conflict fifty of Basta his men were flainealfo, and many moe hurt.

and amongst them Colloniez, hurt in his shoulder and his foot with a small shor.

Basta after this victory marching on with his army, by the way met with certaine other companies of the rebellious Haiducks as he was going to S. Peters, with whom he had many an hot skirmish for the space of three daies together, being by them still put to the worse, infomuch that having burnt many of his carriages, tents and other luggage, he was of nothing more carefull, than how well to get out of their hands. Neuertheleffe keing no other reme- Balla diffeffed dy, he with great courage not onely endured the often and fierce affaults of his enemies, still by the Rebele, more and more encreasing upon him, but the fourth day after so many unfortunat skirmishes, (being the eight and twentieth of Nonember) putting his men in order of battell, right valiantly againe charged the Rebels: who by reason of the darkenesse of the weather, it beeing then a very thicke mist, being not able to perceive where the enemies attempts were most to be feared, or what way to turne their owne forces; as men difmaied, were easily by them ouer- The Rebelth; throwne and put to fight: who fo flying, Basta with his fouldiers fiercely pursuing, made of wasta our. them a great flaughter: fo that in the space of leffe than three houres, fifteen hundred of them throwns. were in this thicke and darke miss slain, with some sew also of Basta his souldiers, and among st them Fredericke Earle of Solmes, and the County of Erbach wounded. Vpon the report of which ouerthrow, the Rebels which yet lay at the fiege of the castle of Zipze, in hope there at length to haue taken Belgiofa, forthwith rose and retired themselues to Leusta. But Basta after F this victory removing to Saint Andrewes, and having recovered that towne from the Rebels, and thereinto put a new garrison, and so by this meanes somewhat daunted and repressed the infolency of the Haiduckes in those quarters, and being not well able longer to keepe the field with his army in so vnseasonable a time of the yeare, and so to maintaine warre as it were both against his enemies, and the extremities of nature, sought by letters to have reclaimed G them of Cassonia againe vnto their obedience; offering vnto them pardon for all their offest ces past, so that they would now at last acknowledge their fault, and receive into their towne a garrison of the Emperors. To which purpose he writ also to them of Eperia, in hope that if he might so have gained those two strong towns, to have in them Wintered in lasery with his army. But them of Cossouia having in the city a strang garrison of six thousand good souldi. crs, and out of feare to be by Basta besieged at that time of the yeare, and withall in hope (if need were) to be by Botscay relieved, (who was then reported to be forty thousand strong) vt. terly refused to hearken to Basta his motion, for their reconciliation, or at all to submit them. felues againe vnto the Emperour. Which caused him with his army to come neerer vnto the city, yet still seeking rather by faire meanes to haue persuaded the citisens to haue returned H vnto their loyalty, than by force to haue constrained them. But finding them obstinately fet downe, and by no persuasions to be remoued, but with their great ordnance in what they might to trouble his campe, he fent before the County Hohenloh and Rotnitz, with part of his army to Eperia, to command them vpon their allegiance to receive the Emperours fouldi. ers into the city, and to relieue them with such things as they were able : and within a few Eperia seelded dayes after, viz. the fifth of December, followed himselfe with the rest of his army. But being come thither, after much talkehad with the chiefe men of the City, it was at length, contrary to all mens expectation, agreed, That Basta assuring them of the free exercise of their religion, of the good behaulour of the fouldiers towards them, and to defend them from the injury and incursions of their enemies, they should open the gates vnto the Imperials, and re- I lieue them with what they were able, and so as before to continue in their allegiance and obedience vnto the Emperour. Of all which things when Basta had vpon his faith given, assured them, they opened their gates and received in the fouldiers : vnto whom now almost dead and started with hunger) nothing could have happened more lucky or welcome. Leusta, Barbeld, Zebena, famous townes in those places, following the example of Eperia, submitted themselves in like manner, and helped Basta his souldiers with reliefe. Thither with great danger came vnto Bafta, Sigefred Collonitz, a man of great power and authority in that part of Hungary, to confer with him about the appealing of these troubles: who afterward by his let-

For the remedy whereof, thirty waggons loded with mony and cloath were fent from Vienna, under the conduct of County Solmes, Colonell Starenberg, the Treasurer, and others: vntowhom Tanhusar joyned fifteene hundred Hussarian horsemen so called) to strengthen the conuoy against the danger which was feared from the Haiducks which lay upon the way, and who indeed were now roaming about and seeking after booty in euery corner of the country. Which Hussars being L come with the rest of the conuoy into a thick wood, about two miles from Filek, like enemies fet voon the waggoners, whom they should have conducted, and there made a great slaughter of fuch as were about to refift them; infomuch that the County Solmes had much ado to fauc himselse and to get out of their hands, leaving the waggons as a prey vnto the trecherous Huffars, who now become masters of them, draue them away to Botscay the Rebels campe: Tanhufar their Captaine in vaine pursuing after them (with such of his Hussars as more faithfull than the rest, had no hand in that so soule a treachery) and recouring nothind but tenne waggons loaded with cloath, which the traitors had left behinde them, having taken the horfes out of them, and put them into the other waggons wherein the mony was, (which was reported to be 130000 florens) with the more speed to bring them unto Betseay. The newes of this fo great a losse being quickly spred thorow all the Emperours campe, at the first filled the fouldiers with griefe and disdaine against the trecherous Hussars, but afterwards with wrath and indignation against their own Commanders, as deeming it to hane bin nothing but a falle report by them deuised and given out to deceive them, and to feed them with a vaine hope. Which perfuation, though not true, had now to strongly possessed their minds, as that they were about all to have rifen up in mutiny, and to have for faken the feruse, to the vtter perill of their Captains, and endangering of the whole Prouince, now upon point to have bin for ever loft, All which mischieses Basta foreseeing, did first what he might with Basta wifely words and faire promifes to have appealed them; which not feruing, he with certaine thou. appealed have foods of duckate and was gone of clock taken we as I and a fair promise thou folding ready fands of duckats and waggons of cloth taken up at Leusta and other townes there by, wifely to forfake bu R contented them, in some good measure furnishing the old souldiers, before halfe naked, both fernice. with mony and apparell, the fouldiers greatest contentments. Which mutiny so againe appealed, the Imperials shortly after surprising a castle not farre from Eperia, found therein a great many of Hungarian Gentlemen, whom they carried away with them prisoners, to learne of them what they might concerning the Rebels proceedings, and further designes. In the meane time the Haiducks on the other side besieged the castle of Sendra, which they after many affaults tooke, and put to the fword all the garrifon fouldiers therin; and departing thence, first rifled and after burnt the towne of Filek. They also took the Discreptore castles of Boluar, Setschin, Dregell, Burac, Holloc, Blauestein, and the strong castle of Cabra taken by the geria, whither they of Hatwan not long before had carried their great ordnance at such time

C as they for feare of the Turks, then lying at the fiege of Strigonium, had abandoned the place: all strong holds in the vpper Hungary. After the taking of which places, Ferentius Radius, and Charles Istuan (Bos scay his neere kinsinan) and the chiefe captains and ring leaders of the rebels, exacted contribution mony of the minerall townes (as they call them) belonging vnto the ming thither, the Rebels in great number went to meet him, and having belaied all the passages, enforced him to retire himselse vnto his castle of Libentsia, where he lying in great dan-D ger with his wife then in child-bed, accompanied but with 50 German foldiers only, for that he durk not to trust his Hungarian Coffackes, now in heart altogether enclining vnto the Rebels, was glad in post to send to Vienna, most humbly requesting to have a new supply of college a ray-German foldiers fent vnto him for his reliefe, and the furtherance of the Emperors service, in the side from that so departures a simple of the country being the help over of the the Vienas. that so dangerous a time and wavering estate of that country, being the best part of that the Emperor then held in Hungary.

Now while Basta thus lay with his army at Eperia and in the country thereabout, he dayly received great harme from the Haiduckes, who were still houering about him, as Hawkes ouer their prey; his fouldiers, by necessity enforced to fetch inwood, and other things necesfary into the campe, being still most miserably slaine and cut in pieces; yea, they were so bold, E as oftentimes to trouble him in his campe, and to affayle the foldiers where they lay quartered in their trenches; as amongst other times, they did in the latter end of December to end the yeare withall: at which time they by night breaking into the quarter where Charles CollonitZ with Copell and Pettinger, two Captaines of Austria, with their companies lay, they slew the faid Copell, with almost all his fouldiers, and burnt Pettinger in his tent, Collonitz himselfe copel and Petbeing at the same time in great danger, and hardly by them befet also, vntill that encouraging tinger state by his men, by performing all the parts both of a good Captaine and valiant fouldier, he by ttue valour enforced them at length to retire backe againe into the woods, from whence they came, having in this conflict flaine foureteene of them with his owne hand.

About this time was a spy taken in the Imperiall campe, one of Bosscay his chiese men, Apieraten. The Turks this yeare were not much fortunat in their warres: Haffan the Visier Bassand G their Generall against the Christians in Hungary having in vaine (as 1s before declared) besset ged Strigonium, and with all his forces done nothing worth the remembrance; and Gicals Bassa their other Generall against the Persians in the East being with all his great power by the Persian King ouerthrowne and put to fight, and the city of Babylon now called Bagdatta ken; as it was first at Prague the two and twentieth of O Gober reported by the Secretary of the Vayuod of Valachia, sent thither by an Embassador from his Master vnto the Emperour, and afterward confirmed by an Embassador sent from the Persian Kinghimselse vnto the Emi peror, who having audience, told his Majesty, how that the King his Master was not ignorant of the great and difficult warre by him now for many yeares maintained against the Turkish Sultan, with whom although he for his part might have lived in peace & amity, yet that moo. H ued with the zeale which one Prince ought to have to the reliefe of another, he had taken vp armes against him, so to auert some, part of that heavy war from his Majesty cuen vpon himfelferand that he had already obtained many great and notable victories & conquetts against him:and recoursed a great territory, wrongfully before taken from the Persian Kings his predecessors by the Turkish Sultans: and that now he was of nothing more desirous; than to joine in a perpetual league and amity with his Majesty, that so in a most strong confederation combined together, they might neuer afterward be diffeuered, or euer make peace with the Sultah, without one anothers knowledge and confent. And further, That for his part he was minded neuer to giue ouer the warre so happily by him begun, vntill he had driven him euen intohis Imperial city of Constantinople, so that his Majesty should on his part do the like, by continuing of his present wars; it being not possible for the Turke to hold out against them both, and the only means to abate his greatnesse, and to affure them in their estates:requesting him withall, to fend backe with him some grave man his Embassador, with sufficient authority and instructions to conferre about these matters with him; that so knowing and understanding one anothers minde, the league and confederation betwist them might the more eafily and commodiously be made and concluded.

Neither were the Turks busied with these forreine warres only, against these so great and mighty Princes, in places fo remote and farre off, but vnto these were joyned their owne intestine and civill warres and troubles also; the Rebels being yet up in the lesser Asia, and the Baffa's of Aleppo and Damasco, two of the most famous cities in Siria, and both of themmen K of great place and command, of late vp in armes one of them against the other: insomuch, that they had brought the matter to be tried by the fword in the plaine field, where the Baffa of Aleppo in a great and bloudy battell ouercome, and flying vnto his own city, was by the Baffa of Damasco pursued thither, and so streitly by him belieged with an army of thirty thoufand men, that in fine he was glad to reconcile himfelfe vnto him, and to make his peace, by yeelding vnto him what soeuer the other Bassa his enemy pleased to demand of him; as being thereunto driven by the extremity of famine, which then reigned in the city; as also for that he had lost a great number of his men, whom he had fent secretly out of the city to seeke for vi Auals, being all flaine by the Baffa of Damasco his souldiers. With which so great matters the Baffaes of the Court (who had the mannaging of the State under the young Sultan) were L much troubled, he himselse (as was fittelt for his yeres) in the meane time delighting himsels Sultan debmat with the pleasures of the Court, and much rejoyeing at the birth of his first begotten son, who was about that time borne.

The revolution of time had now thus brought this yeare to an end, the troubles of Hungary and Transylvania yet still more and more so encreasing, as if that those most miscrable countries had by the just and heavy judgements of God beene now appointed vnto their last and otter ruine and destruction: the causes of their so great miseries proceeding not so much from the Turks their enemies, as from the naturall inhabitants themselves; who in minds divided both in religion and affection, some of them continuing in their allegiance vnto the Emperor, and othersome following the Ensignes of the Rebell Bosseay, did both unto themselves M and to their country more harme in a little time, than had the Turks in many yeres before. Of which so dangerous a diffention, and of the harmes thereof infuing, Belioiofa left by Basta as his Lieutenant, was reported to haue beene the first and chiefe authour: For whereas the yeare before the Bishops and other Clergy men, in an assembly of them at Possonium, had without the knowledge of the Nobilitie and States of Hungary, published a Decree by them there made, for the burning or perpetual banishing of all such as were of the Reformed Religion in Hungary : and that the States of that kingdome vnderstanding thereof, and solemnly protefling against the same, under the Scale of the Lord Palarine had publiquely affirmed, with just Arms to defend themselves, if they should for their Religion be called into question or troubled: and had again repeated the same their protestation at Galset. Yet Belioiosa neuertheles in the meane time by cunning seising upon the reformed churches at Cassovia, would not suffer the Citisens of the Reformed Religion there, to have any Sermons in their owne privat houses, or so much as to reade on the holy Bible. Neither any whit mooued with the former B protestations of the Nobilitie and States, had taken unto himselfe all the lands and goods of them of their Religion in Cassovia, not suffering them to bury the bodies of their dead within the city, neere vnto the Monasteries. And requesting to have borrowed of Boiseay certaine The cause of thoulands of crownes, and thereof by him denied, caused his souldiers to ransacke two of his solicas his re-Castles, and to spoyle him of all the wealth and treasure he therein had. For which indignities and injuries Bosseay inraged, caused open proclamation to be made, That hee would give vnto euery Haiducke that would serue him, four Crownes a moneth pay, with all the booty that they could get. Whereupon fix thousand Haiduckes which then serued under Belioiosa, forthwith revolted vnto Botfen, their number increasing daily. But after that vnto this extraordinary pay, Pallas Lippa his Lieutenant had also joined the protection of the Reformed C Religion, it is wonderfull to say, how the Haiducks by heaps reforted vnto him, and how the people in all parts of Hungary generally fauoured him and his quarrell; beeing in all places whereas he came, ready to join hands with him against the Imperials. The Turkes and Tartars also, both with men and mony furthering him in all his doings, whose help he resused not. Whereof proceeded all the aforefaid miseries both in Hungary and Transylvania, with many other worfe than they, which together with the beginning of this year tooke their beginning and encrease also. Vitowhich so great troubles still more and move encreasing, Basta not able by force to give remedy, fought by lenitie and faire persuasions to have eased the same : by Letters oftentimes aduiting euen Botscay the chiefe Rebell himselfe, to change his minde, to lay downearmes, to dif-band his forces, and to persuade with the rest of his seditious follow-D ers, to submit themselues vnto the Emperour, and to return again evnto their wonted obedience. Whereunto he at length answered, That if the gouernment of all Transylvania might be left vnto himselse alone: If a naturall Hungarian borne might bee still chosen Lieutenant Generall in Hungary: if none but such as were Hungarians borne, should have the governement and commaund of all the garrifons in Hungary: if the Wallon and French fouldiers might be shut out of Hungarie : If the natural! Hungarians borne might from thenceforth be regarded and provided of their pay: If it might bee lawfull for every man to have the free exercise of his Religion: If the authors of these troubles might be delivered vnto the Hungarians to be punished: If the Emperour himselse in person should come and be present at the Parliament at Presbourg: If the Germane garrison souldiers should still keepe themselves E within the places wherunto they were appointed, without making of any incursions into the towns or villages need vnto them, or hurting of the poor countrey men; he could then be content to come to such a good agreement for peace. With which offer he sent two of the Rebels his followers vnto Basta; who not liking thereof, returned them backe again without concluding of any thing.

But while things were thus in talke, some of the Haiducks in the meane time, with a number of Tartars joined vnto them, in feeking after booty surprised Gokara a towne ouer against prijed by the Strigonium : where having flain certain Germanes who had the keeping of the place, and ri- Maidately, fled the town, as they were about to have fet it on fire, by the comming ouer of the governor of Strigonium with his garrifon, they were inforced to for sake the place, and again to retire. F This loffe received at Gokara was again by our men requited by the taking of Palantwar, a Palantwar tagood fortreffe of the Turks, aften a long and cruel fight taken by Captain Bathian (Comman-kendy the Imder of the Imperiall troupes on this side the river of Danubius) whereinto a number of the perial. Turks being retyred, were there together with the garrison soldiers all slain, and among them diversmen of great account, who but some few daies before were come thither. Which fortresse Captain caused to be forthwith rased, because it should no more stand the Turks in G

Vicia firmefully beirayed co the Tures.

The Turks about this time had a purpose to besiege Vacia, a city not farre from Vicegrade on the other fide of Danubius, a place which still did them great harme and stood the Chris filans in great stead. The garrison of which place was part Germans, and part Hungarians, as the rest of all the garrisons in the Imperiall rowns of Hungary were. Of which the Turks put. pose for the siege, the trecherous Haiducks there in garrison having got vinderstanding, confaired to deliuer vato them the place; and yet not fo contented, to loyne thereunto a treaton more bloudy and treacherous than was the betraying of the towne : for finding themselues by far too strong for the Germanes in garrison in the towne with them, they fell vpon them, tearing no fuch matter, and flew most part of them, the rest saving themselves by speedy slight H to Strigonium and fo afterward, according to their former pretended treason, delivered the towne to the Turks, joining with them and the Tartars, and directing them for the more casic spoiling of the Christians and the countrey thereabout.

The taking of this City of Vacia had in short time called together great numbers of the Turks and Tartars out of all places of the Realme; who together with the Haiducks made a great and puissant army, to the terror of the Christians, not then able to hold the field against them, and the encouraging of the Turks, thus holpen even by the Christians themselves, to the destroying of one another. With this army they turned from Vacia to Gokara, with a purpose from thence to have passed over the Danubius vpon the yee, and to have surprised Strigonium. Which exploit they had once before attempted against the base towne, being 1 then by the Christians repulsed and beaten backe with their great and small shot out of the town, as now they were againe. Howbeit that feeing the number of their enemies daily more and more to increase, they in Strigonium stood more in doubt of a second siege, than they had done of the first whereof we have before spoken.

The report of these so great troubles, and of the generall revolt of the discontented Haiducks in Hungarie, much troubled and grieued the Christian Emperor: Who both in respect of his honour, and of the fafety of his chate, raised what power he might out of his provinces thereabout, and leuied great fummes of money from his fubiects, taking a ducket vpon every house in Austria, being then in great feare of these miseries and mischieses so fast spreading, and fill more and more increasing and approaching that way. Vnto whose forces already on K foot, had the aid promised from the King of Spaine, the Pope, the Princes of Italy and Germanie, with fix thousand footmen and two thousand horse out of Bohemia, bin in time joyned, they might have made a sufficient army vnder the conduct of Basta the Emperous Lieutenant, to have repressed both the attempts of the enemy, and the infolencie of the rebellious Haiduckes. All or most part of which aid this yeare failing, and Basta with his small forces much weakened with wants and the extremitie of Winter, and not able to keep the field, the enemies still increasing both in number and in strength, and without feare of any to encounter them, at their pleasure roaming vp and downe, began now to draw necre vnto Vicegrade (a good and strong towne of Hungarie standing upon the side of Danubius, about the mid way betwixt Buda & Strigonium) with a purpose to have besieged the same. Of whose comming L the Germans there in garrison hearing, and warned by the trechery of the Haiducks of Vacia, what to seare from the Haiducks in garrison with them in Vicegrade, betime retyred themfelues out of the towne into the Castle. In which doing they were well aduited, being otherwise like enough to haue run the same fortune that the Germanes their sellowes before had done at Vacia. For the Turks with the rebellious Haiducks were no fooner come thither, but Piecgrade yeal that the Haiducks in the towne, without more ado, opened the gates of the towne vnto them, ded wnto the as unto their friends, directing them in best fort they could both for the besieging and winning of the castle. Which while the Turks hardly besieged, and the Germans therein notably ning of the caltie. Which while the Lurks narray beneged, and the Command the defended, Haffan the Visier Bassa, together with Begedes Bassa, to persuade them to yeeld vp. the Castle, writ vnto them in this fort.

Right worthy and valiant friends, it is not to you unknowne, the Castle of Vicegrade of right to belong unto our most mighty and dread Soucraigne, the great Sultan. And therefore feeing that it is reason that every man should have that which of right belongeth wate him Wee advertise and teA quest you so yeeld up the same Castle unto our most mighty Emperour, and the honorable Lord Scephen Boticay, Prince of Hungary; and with all your substance to depart thence. Promising you upon our faith and honor, to fuffer you quietly and in fafety, with your wines and children, bag and baggage, to depart thence, and to promide you sufficient shipping for the carrying away of your things to Strigonium. Ind if it shall please you so take part with vs, we pramise you the same pay from our Emperor, that you had from your owne ; and the fame kind entertainment which the Wallons have before had with vs. But if that you upon an obstinat resolution shall refuse this our friendly motion and grace offered unto gou, blame us not if we shall by strong hand and force of arms seck to obtains our right stokindnesse we offer you our filend-(hip, and fo with freed expect your answer.

But the Germanes hearkning not vnto these letters, as men resolued, valiantly stood vpon the defence of themselves, and of the place, vntill that by extream necessity forced therunto, they yeelded the same by composition.

Basta in the mean time with his forces much diminished lying at Eperia, and in the country thereabout, seeing the general repolt of the Haiducks, of late the Emperors chief strength in Hungary, and Bot fear the Rebels strength daily to increase more and more, with no possibilitie for himselfe with so small forces as he then had, to represse the Rebels intolencie, or to temedie these so far spreading euils, but for want of greater strength he must lie stil as it were aman befieged, was therwith exceedingly grieued, and as it were almost ouerwhelmed with c the heavy burthen of fo many great miseries at once besetting him. To threaten without power he knew to be but folly; and to speake faire, to be but vaine. Neuerthelesse having procured from the Emperour a generall pardon for all fuch as having taken part with the Rebels, were willing to return again to their allegiance: hee to affure all them whom it might concern, of the Emperours gratious fauour, and to put them all out of feare, caused Lotters of generall pardon to be published, for all men to take knowledge of: The purport whereof

This proclamation folemnly by Basta published, with the found of many drums and trumpets, the fixteenth of lanuary, and ten daies libertie giuen for fuch as would to come in and a gain submit themselues; divers gentlemen of the country neer vato Eperia, where Basta with his army lay, for fear of being spoiled came in, and accepted of the grace offered other of the Seditious dwelling farther off, little or nothing at all regarding the fame. Infomuch that the Rebels in number daily increasing, and the rebellion farther and farther spreading, Bosses was was now grown fo frong, that he dismissed from him most part of the Turkes, whose services he had in all these troubles hitherto vsed, reserving yet certain Ianizaries, wom he mingled H with the garrison of Haiducks which he had put into Cassovia.

Tallas Lippa

Pallas Lippa, before by Bosseay taken prisoner, and vpon his revolt from the Emperour, by Boilean made his Lieutenant General, and a great man among it the Rebels (as is before declared) was now of many thought to be a most fortunat and happy man. But in the middest of fuch his happinesse, and the greatnes of his command, he was by the malice of some, enuying at his estate, accused to Bosscay, as if he had had a purpose to have made him away; and deliuering the strong city of Cassovia vnto Basta, to have gon over again vnto the Emperour, and to haue followed his Enfignes. Vpon which fuspition he was by Botscay's commandement beheaded, with fine other men more of good place, suspected to have bin partakers in the confoiracie with Lippa. In whose treasure, after he was executed, was found an hundred thousand Hungarian ducats, with feuen hundred chains of gold; all which he had scraped together in that (hort time wherin he had bin Botfoay's Lieutenant among it the rebels. With which mos nev Botfay in his rebellion confirmed, became more furious and obstinat than before y notadmitting any talk with Baffa concerning peace, but vpon fuch vnreasonable conditions as best flood with his own good liking.

Now long and tedious it were to profecute every particular exploit, with the divers woful events thereof during this fo great and dangerous a rebellion in Hungary; which how heavy focuer they were for the poore Christians there dwelling to endure, as tending all to the ruin and destruction both of themselves and of their countrey (sometime one of the most flourithing kingdomes thorowout all Christendome, but now become as it were a large Theatre g for all the World to behold most wofull tragedies and bloudy massacres acted in yet for all that, vnto some nothing is pleasing, but what is written of the greatest actions; as of great and bloudy battels, of the conquests of whole Kingdomes, and the ruine of most mighty and famous Princes; all other things else beeing vnto them tedious. In some part to case them of such wearinesse, and to please their appetites, I will briefly passe ouer, and even lightly touch fuch things as for the most part of this year passed in this troublesome Country; not flaving but vpon matters of greatest weight and importance.

The Haiduckes still proceeding in their rebellion, in the beginning of February belieged the castle of Sacmar, a place very fit for their purpose. Which Castle the souldiers there in garri (on doubting to be able to hold against them, being not past threescore sound men left. L in it, and destitute also of their necessarie provision, covenanting to have their lives spared, at to its maidete length yeelded vnto them. But in going thence, meeting with certaine other companies of Haiducks neer unto Tokay, they were by them most part of them slaine, some few of themby speedy slight escaping. The same Haiducks which had taken Sacmar, immediatly after attempted to have surprised the town and castle of Tocay: also: but the Gouernor of the place in good time aduertised of their intent and purpose, caused the ice wherewith the River was hard frozen, to be broken forty paces over neer vnto the castle, and the same to be lightly coucted ouer with ftraw. VV hither the Haiducks comming by night, and finding the ice on the other fide the river, whereunto they first came, frong enough to beare them; by heaper thrufling one another forward to have scaled the castle, the ice breaking under them, they there M together by heapes most miserably perished; many of the rest which escaped that danger, being with thot out of the castle flain also. In this castle was no great store of victuals : wheref Basta understanding, with his army matched from Eperia toward Budae, a town holden by the

A Rebels, in hopewith the spoile thereoff to have relicuted. Tokay Burshe Rebels hearing of his comming, having themselses burnt the town, had got themselses with that they had, into the Caftle, and from shence Buth their great Ordnands lowel contrated of 4/14 and is somming, that disposinted of his purpose, and having lost some of his men, betwee gladwich all speed diot having fledyed about four phomes) to returne again to Eperial settain of the stability of their country, which tooke part with the Rebels, being reported, in his shience to baue made a road towards Eperia, to the endangering of that City. In which his returne towards Eperia, the trougs of County Turon, and of Charles Collenitz, by chance lighting vpon son Haiducks in a country village, let the laid on fire, and therein burnt most of the laid Rebets, and flew the condition that remained in feeking by flight to flaudiaucd themfeluci.

In the mean one of the great men among the Turks came to Caffoura, bringing with

fig. a great that of money, which being divided among it the Rebels there, much confirmed them, both in their rebellion, and devotion toward the Turks; which rebellion they is pared not for any coll by all meanes to maintaine, as more prevailing thereby, than by the greatest forces they could vie for the conquering of Hungary.

But Baffe was no fooner with his army returned agains to Epetia, but that the fouldiers ge-Baffa but foldi-perally exclaiming, and calling upon him for their pay, were about in a mixing to have for fa-diers in making Kenhim; for the appearing of which tumult, he was glad prefently to make what shift he could for thoney, wherewith hee in tome measure gaue them contentment, and lowith much ado, agreed with them for fix weeks fernice longer, thereby delinering the citilens of Eperia from a great feate, wherein they were, for being spoyled by those mutinous soldiers, of whom they stopp in no less doubt than they did of their enemies.

And now the feditions Haiducks after their wonted manner full roaming up and down the upper part of Hungarie, the fecond day of March, about feuen of the clocke in the morning came to Neufoll, a Faire in that countrey, and there by many reasons persuading the citisens to revolt, and to take part with them, had parley with them till it was full twelve of the clock; but drawing fill neerer and theerer to the sown. Infomuch that Turbelim governor of the place, perceiuing a yeelding inclination in the citisens, and doubting without their help to be able to defend forgreat a city against the Haiducks, with fo weak a garri fon us he then had thereing he with his Coffacks, for his more safety retyred himself into the castle. Which don, the Hai-D ducks forthwith breaking into the City with fix companies, funmoned the caftle, requiring to have it delivered unto them. Of whom Turbelius flew divers with fhor our of the caffile : and the fame day in the evening couragiously fallying out of the castle, with certaine companies of Harquebusiers, draue the Haiducks againe out of the city: which he afterward better fortified against their like attempts. And the next day understanding by a countreyman, That certain companies of Haiducks and Turks together, were comming to Turtzo, a town not far off, earrying with them a great number of cattel, women and children, which they had got out of the country villages and towns therabout the presently sent forth his lieutenant against them, with his Coffacks (a desperat kind of horsmen) who meeting with these Haiducks and Turks, flew of them about 150, and recovered from them all the captives, the cattell, with 200 hor-B. fes, and a mule loaded with 4000 Hungarian duckars.

Now had Filek (a most beautiful castle, and as it were the key of that part of the upper Hun-Fikely selded gary, which the Christian Emperor yet held against the Turks) for certain months bin hardly befieged by the Haiducks: which although it was fo well stored with victuals, and other neceffary pronision, as that it might have holden out three months longer siege, yet the foldiers there in garrison for want of water were enforced now at length to yeeld the same. For the Reeping of which castle Redeius Ferentsius, captain of the Haiducks which had won it, placed therein a garrison, part Haiducks, part Turks: as not daring to trust either of them alone, the Haldneks for feare of their trecherie; nor the Turks, for that he knew them to be defirous of the place, for the commodious scituation thereof, as giving them a way to enter farther into the tetritories of the Christians : which Redeim, though a Rebell, would not yet in any fore grant them.

This Oakle of Filek fo (as is beforefaid) befieged, the valiant Collonitz had oftentimes in Nannn 1 vain fought to hauerclieued allethe waier being fo befer and as it were fortified with infinite G numbers of the Turks, Tamers and Rebels as that there was no comming vino it and most of his own foldiers being Haideeks alfo, to whom he durft not welstruft, for fear of being berry. ed by them. Concerning which matters be thortly after writing to a persaint noblemanate he had shewed with him, Then he desired nothing more of the Emperor than to be discharged of his firuice, he thus broaketh forthenogen go it, is leaded and anisot age was the contract of to the realist change done of the Coy. > ti ke kiril di Kabupatèn kabupatèn kal Now if Collenia, one of the greatest and best commanders of the Emperors forces against the Turks in Hungary, was thus before and spoiled of his substance by the rebels, as he in these his letters complaineth, and as indeed he was having at one time received fo great harm from them as was valued to an hundred thouland ducats; and not daring to trust his owne Hungarian foldiers, whose hearts he knew to be with the rebels: In what state may the rest of the people of that diffressed province be thought to have bin being at the same time exposed to the same rebels as a prey and spoil, and their country laid open for the Turkes and Tartars to forrage at their pleasure.

> But in briefe to run along with the Haiducks: four thou and of them attempting to have furprised Wiglase, were so from thence repulsed, as that many of them being there slain, thirtie five wagons were fearfe sufficient to carry the rest of the wounded oner the mountaines, of whom an hundred died by the way. But going from thence they brake into Turfans country, where having rifled all the towns and villages, they commanded all the States of the country, within three daies after to submit themselves to Botscay, & to swear unto him fealty sor otherwife to expect all extremities : who with fear difmaied, promifed to submit themselmes vato ?

Redeiss, Betfcar's Lieutenant. Embaffadours

Now for remedie of these enils, Napragisu and Forgation, two grave Counsellors, were dispatched in the Emperours name to entreat of speace with Bosseay. Who the seuen and twentieth day of March departing from Eperia, with fourfcore harquebusiers towards Cassonia; before they came thither fent before them an herauld to advertise Bosseay of their comming. Which messenger so soon as he was come into Cassovia, the Turks so streightly kept, as that no man might speake with him but Botseay himselfe, and not he also, but in open place, and that in the hearing of the Turkes. Who at his first meeting with him told him, That if the Embassadors from whom he came were sent from the Nobilitie and States of Hungarie, they should be right welcome vnto him, and have audience : but if they came from the Emperous, M as had Rogatfim and Ciaccim before them, fent from Botfeay, they should then spare their labours and come no farther, for that all matters had with him beene often enough talked woon : it being now more than time, that things fo often consulted upon, should bee no more

Which messenger returning vnto the Embassadours, told them what Boifes, had faid and that the Haiducks had in Castovis buile a bulwark of a won. derful height, befor the gates with firong gards, and fo allow the trembles with fooldiers; that a man sould hardly enter into the City, howbest that enery man might lafely contrand goe thitherabout his trade and busines. He told them also, That Business' lieutenant had collect together all the gouernors of the places therabouts, and admited them for the space of sourceen daies to beware of the excursions of the Haiducks , and in the mean time for their more fafety, to bring their wines and children, with fuch other thingers they made most reckoning of iato the city; for that he could not as yet (as he faid) represse the viruly and headstrong Haiducks, being yet in their rage and fury, as the maner of the discontented multitude is. My hich fulpition two mellengers newly come from Gicala Baffa energe fed 3, who extnessly by them defined new supplies to be forthwith sent H ento him: otorefting. That foraimsch as he had not long before in a great battel loft number of his men, if he were not with new supplies speedily relieued, he must of force retyre and leave all to the Persant Howbeit, the fire quenched, and the lanizaries and other fouldiers with the fooil they backgotten by others loffes facisfied, the sumult was without much adoe again quieted.

Now besides the aforesaid troubles from the rebels in Transylvania and the vpper Hungafoldiers in mar ry, that neching might be wanting voto the mileries of those so milerable countries, the Bm. perours fouldiers which ferued under Bafta, having of long from day today in vain expected their pay, and feeing neither their pay nor other reliefe to come vnto them role vp in mutiny. and so in great rage brake into Bassa the General's lodging, where having heaped voorhim I many vnworthy and despightfull reproches, with their pieces beneagainst him, and taking the fooil of many cariages loden with very rich commodities, they departed from him and fo marching thorow the country toward Presburg, by the way vied fuch infolencie and crucky. by rifling and spoiling what source came to hand, as that they seemed vnto the people as they went workeand more inhumane than the very Turks and Tartars themselves: where among the other prey by them taken, which was very great, they carried away with them toward Prefburg about ten thousand oxen and two thousand horses; threatning as they went to burn the fuburba of the city to foone as they came thither, if they were not forthwith paid their pay. Whereupon many of the Citifens for feare forfooke their dwellings and removed vnto the state of commercial in the thirty of war blanch

But the rebels on the other fide (as is before declared) having in varie attempted Newfol, so the Haidake: being forthwith driven out of it again; affembling themselves in great number came now a gain and belieged it, and the 16 of April took it, to the great and incomparable loft of the citisens. Other of their fellowes in other places having but the day before taken Cibinium, Portfeld Schemnitferwith some other places also.

Thus while the Haiducks at their pleasure on the one side spoil the voper part of Hungary, and the Emperors foldiers on the other fide forwant of pay doe therein no leffe harmethan they, as enemies rifling and ranfacking every corner of the Countrey as they went; the poore husbandmen dwelling here and there, dispersed abroad in the country for seare leaving their homely dwellings with fuch things as they had, fled fome of them into Polonia, other fome L into the mountains, where many of them perished with hungerithe poor husbandmannot dering now to go forth to till his land, neither the shepheard to feed his flock, all places beeing filled with miferie, mourning, and heavinesse; the Turker and Tartars, the common enemier of the Christians, beeing not the causers thereof, but even the Christians themselves, one of them enen with greedinesse seeking the ruine and destruction of another as it commonly happens in kingdoms and states divided.

Neither did thele fo great troubles, the ground of formany mileries, containe themselves within the bounds of Hungary only, but brake out into other countries and provinces thereunco adjoining alfo; but especially into Moravia, into which Countrey the Haiduckes brea king, miferably spoyled the same, by force took certaine townes, which they robbed and if M fled, carrying away with them even the very little children, taken from their heavy parents, to be sold afterwards vnto the Turks: a miscrable kinde of merchandise, and of all Christians to

A hedetested. For remedy of which mischiels, by sufferance still more and more increasing, Liebtenflein gouernor of the country baving raifed all the power he was able to make, went against them, and with much ado draue them out of the Countrey, with fire and fword now by them most grieuously spoyled. They for all that carrying away with them a great part of the wealth of that Country, with foure thousand captines, all by them appointed vnto the Turks flauery.

About this time also Bastalying at Presbourg, and understanding that sourceen thousand Turks and Tartars being come to S. Georges, fix thousand of them were gone ouer the Danubius, about a mile beneath Presburg, to the end that whilft they were making a rode into Aufiria, the rest in the mean time might proue their forces vpon Presburg with his horsemen followed after them himself, to cut off such stragling companies of them as otherwise might haue dongreat harm abroad in the country: leaving behind him in Presburg but three hundred Wallon horsmen, with certain companies of sootmen for the keeping of the city: which three hundred horimen being very good and expert foldiers, and defirous to be doing fomething by night made a road out of the city toward S. Georges, where the rest of the Haiducks and Turkes in great securitie lay : vpon whom these resolute men vpon the sudden falling, brought a great fear voon the whole camp; and having flain of them aboue five hundred before the rest could arm themselves, returned with a great victory, though but with smal preve carrying with them some sew horses of service to Presburg : where by that they had done, it was reasonably thought, that had they bin but a thousand strong, they had discomfitted the ec nemies whole camp.

In the mean time they of the garifon of Comora understanding that Begedes Bassa was determined with a notable conuoy to go from Budawith seuenteen wagons loded with money and other things of great value to Boifear the Rebel, and the Tartar Cham his fon, who with certain thousands of Tartars was come to Solnoc, to the aid of Botscay and the rebels : they in hope of so great a booty lay in wait for him vpon the way whereby he must needs passe, and at his comming set upon him and slew a number of his men , among st whom it fortuned the negetie Basse Baffa himfelf to be flain, that in the breft with a fmal that whileft hee was mounting up his flain. horse: whose dead body the Turkes about him having taken vp, and therewith about to flie. were there some of them flaine, and some of them taken prisoners, the rest by speedy slight e-D scaping. Herewere also all the aforesaid wag ons taken, with an exceeding rich bootie. All which the garrison soldiers, well worthy therof, carried away with them to Comora, together with the Baffa's head, ftruck from his body with his own scimiter: which scimiter, with the Bassa's rich coat, Pogramu Gouernot of Comora afterward sent as a present to the Emperour at Prague. This Baffa whilft he lived was a most crafty and subtil man, the chiefe plotter and author of all the late troubles in Hungary having before put all Transylvania into most dangerous stirs and tumults, and greatly confirmed Bossicay in his rebellion. He spake the Hungarian language naturally, and was therinvery eloquent, which ferued him to great purpose both for the raising and maintaining of the rebellion both in Transilvania and in Hungary, Which so dangerous a man taken out of the way, many were in good hope of some good end to bee E made of these civil wars, more dangerous unto the state of both these afflicted countries, than were the great and puissant armies of the Turks, which were almost every year in the heart of one or other of them to be feen.

Now was the rebellion grown fo great in Hungary, and the rebels fo strong, that even the very name of the Germans was become vnto the Hungarians both odious and contemptible: infomuch that Bafta offering to have pur new supplies of German souldiers into the City of Tyrna, then in danger of the Haiducks, the Gouernours of the place not onely refused to reine them, but also to let them have any thing of them for their ready money; saying, That they had citifens ynow in the city to defend the same against their enemies, and that therfore as they needed not the helpe of the Germanes, to they would have nothing to do with them. F And yet as foon as Redeisu, Bosfeay his lieutenant, was with his army come thicher, they with-Out more ado opened vitto him the gates of the city, and receiving him in, were about to have flain all the Germans there dwelling among it them, being welneere a third part of the inhabitants; & had fo done, but that fome wifer than the raft, confidering that the Garmans having there long dwelt, were by often mariages joined in affinitie with the Hungarians, and the G Hungarians with them, otherwife perfuaded them, left an folding they thight feeme to be cruell against their owne bloud. And so the matter being referred to Redein himselfe, it was by him (by the counsel of one of the greatest men of the Parks) ordered. That the Germans should be spared their lines; so that from thepeeforth they should no more we the Germans but the Hungarian apparel and attyre; only the German attyre being taken away for the Germans themselves.

The Rebels pro seedings in Hungary,

But to proceed with these troubles according to the course of the time and of the years, about the source and twentieth day of May, the Turks and Tartars Journing their forces with the Rebels, burnt sources of Country Villages about the lake of Neuridier, and as many more in other places also towards Newstat; leaving behinde them most lamentable remembrances and testimonies of their barbarous and inhumane crueltie, having put most of the women and children to the sword, and impaled divers upon stakes, carrying the men away with them as Captiues, and the beasts and cattell as a prey; and so leaving the country as they went almost desolate, scarse any being therein less to bewail the miseries thereof. And about the end of this same moneth the Rebels surprised Simega, Grotta, and Coppernacium, and a little while after Gintium: all which places they risted and spoiled, as they did also Hogengoa, a great towne of the Lord Lichtensteins; and Nidersprungs a towne of Gollonizzes, which they first ristled, and afterwards burnt: and with the terrour of this their dealing enforced all the Country thereabout both farre and neere to yeeld unto them: onely Altfoll and Cremnicz, who continued in their loyaltie, and standing saft for the Emperour, did the Rebels very much larme.

About the beginning of Iune, certaine companies of Turks and Haiducks mingled together, came againe as they had before done, to Presburg. Of whose comming the Gouernom of the City hauing aduertisement, with three troupes of Wallon horsemen, and certain companies of harquebusiers, breaking out of the city, caused them forthwith to retyre. Which the Wallon horsemen seeing, to preuent them in their retreit, setching a compasse about, met with them when they thought themselves pastal danger, and falling upon them, slew of them since hundred, and draue the rest into Danubius: so that of all those Turks and Haiducks none escaped but only sourceen, amongs whom three Turks and one sugitive Citisen of Presburg were sound, whom together with a great spoil the garrison soldiers carried backe with them k into the city.

At the selfe same time the Citisens of Vesprinium sauouring the proceedings of the Haiducks, rose themselves in rebellion also, and taking the Captaine of the Castle, together with his Lieutenant and the keyes of the Castle, caused them to be carried to Redeim, Instant, his Lieutenant; yeelding themselves into his protection. Of which revolt of the city the Torks tooke exceeding pleasure, and forthwith sense newes thereof vnto the Sultan, wishing him to hast the comming of his Army; for that the passages were now layd open vnto his suited conquests. And surther adulting him, still more and more to encourage Bossay in his rebellion.

And now was Hungary too little, or elle too bare, to contain and fatisfie the fill increasing I Rebels, who in great number breaking into Stiria (as they had before done on the other side of Hungary into Moravia) did therin great harm, wasting and spoiling all before them as they went: insomuch that County Serin, the lord Nadashi, and Budian, all right worthy then, & such as hertosore had don great things against the Turks, for the Christian commonweale, seeing themselves and all that they had in danger to be spoiled, being not able to with find the Rebels, nor having any other stay whereour cores, submitted themselves who Bussel's add than other noblemen of that country also. Out of Stiria the rebels made head into Austria, indicates roming up and down the country, did like harm.

Thus was the state of Austria and Hungary at this sime most miserable: which for that it is so well set down in certain letters by a grave and understanding civilen of Victing, who wis thin selfe an eye witnessed most part therof, as that it cannot well be better expressed. That thought it good to refer the report therof unto the letters themselved. It is not a subject to the selfent and the sel

All Austria (faith be) is full of misery and calamitte. From out of the Castle and Bulwarks here Aletter shows at Vienna, a man may sometimes at once behold fifteene Townes and willages all on fire in the Country ble troublet of bereabout, kindled partly by the Rebels and Turkes, and partly by our owne mutinous fouldiers. Oden- Hungaric and burg is get befreged, and the Haiduckes have forraged the Countrey as farre as Hinberg : whom had not Aufria. the Regiment of Collonitz repressed, these our suburbs of Vienna had now beene taken, ransacked, and burnt. Newstat is on enery side besieged by the Enemy : all the Villages about Vienna, as far as Dresskirc arewith fire destroyed. They of Newstat went about to have cut off some part of the Enemies Forces, but with enill successe, having lost about fifty of their owne men. Brunna and Entzendorse are also with fire consumed. The Wallons tie incamped at Miedling, most miserably spoiling the Country peo-B ple of all that they had. The Haiduckes having by night surprised the great towne of Altenbourg, and from thence carrying a great prey, have burnt it. The Castle had endured the like fortune, had not an hundred Harquebusiers that were by chance come thither, holpen to defend it. Six thousand of the Enemics lie about Wisfelbourg, but whether the Wallons will attempt any thing against them or no, is greatly doubted. Presbourg is also ingreat danger; for the Garrison souldiers there doe threaten the cruell spoyle of the Citisens, with all extremities, if by a certaine day they recesse not their pay. Who if they hall depart thence there is no doubt but that the Haidnekes will forthwith succeed them in their places. These men indeed doe pretend Religion; but what louers they be thereof, the late example of a Minister by them most cruelly tormented, not farre from Cobbelsdorffe, doth manifestly show. The report is, That the Vayuod of Valachia doth fauor neither part : into which province a great number of Tartars are C come in the aid of Boticay. All the Market places and streets here in this City, lie full of poore fugittue creatures of all fexes and ages, a most miserable sight to behold. Our owne musinous souldiers befit all the wayes to the City, and exclude vs from all manner of vertuall; and not to vermany words, in cruelty and hostilisie almost exceed the very enemies. The Hungarian Rebels, who of late forraged Austria, have carried away with them above eight thousand head of Cattell, which together with the prisoners by them taken, they have sent into Turkey. The little boyes and children, which cannot by reason of their tender years go, they carry along with them upon horfes, whose pittiful mourning and lamentation might moone enen the very stones; and yet are they (inhumane men) no whit mooned. Yea many of these poore foules are here and there by the way found daffied against the ground with their braines beaten out. And thefe Rebels in their behausour flew fuch crucky, as whereat the very Turkes themselves were a-D mased. All things about Isenstad are by the Enemics taken and carried away. They of Newhose, besteged by thirtie thousand of their Enemies, have hitherto played the men, and of late repulsed the second affault, with much flaughter of their enemies. They fay, That two thoufand Tartars, as many Rebels, and thirteen thousand Turkes, are to be yet expetted to come unto the camp at Newbuse who if they shall chance to come, it can scarce be that they of Newhuse can long well hold out against them; especially being not well appointed of necessarie provision. The report is, That having taken Newhuse, they will remoue to Strigonium. It is also said twelve thousand Turkes to have now passed oner the bridge at Essec ; and great supplies both of men and money to come to Botscay, who lieth incamped about Eperia, and is faidto have made a covenant with the great Sultan, That what place soever either of them should first take, he should hold the same wholly wato himselfe. Tanhuser, who of late was Gouernor of Fileck, is E now (as the common report goeth) of counfell with Boticay. Germenchius hath put in three meneths vittuall into Hust in Transflvania. God in his mexcy behold our poore afflicted and distressed

Thus far he. Whereby the Reader (as I suppose) may easily gather the miserable estate of both the countries of Hungary and Austria; the Christians themselves being the chief authors therof.

The rebellious Haiduckes had hitherto most streightly besieged the city of Odenbourg, having assaulted it in flue sundry places at once. Vpon whom Traitmansforst, who was General of the garrison there, causing part of his horsemento sally forth, skirmished with them from eleven of the clocke in the forenoon, at which time the Haiducks beginning to prevaile, the Governor with the rest of his horsement.

G king out of the gate, discomfited the Haiduckes, put them to flight, and flew many of them. having taken from them twelve enfignes, with many prisoners, whom he carried with him into the city. Of which ouerthrow the Haiduckes desirous to be reuenged, with their renewed forces (horrly after returned agains who the city, burnt the fuburbs of the same, and spoyled the villages thereabout. But whilest they thus lay about Odenburg, Basta but with a small power drawing necrevato them, they presently rose, and passing ouer the river Dranus car. ried away with them two thousand heads of Cattell, with a great number of Christian

H Of which firong city, being the best that the Christians now held in the voper Hungary, the Turkes were most desirous, both for the commodious scituation thereof, and also for that they deemed themselues partly thereof already possessed, some good part of the garrison therein being Turkes, as well Ianizaries as others. The full possession of which strong City the better to obtaine from Botfeay, and to get it into their owne hands, they fent vnto him three waggons loaded with mony and other rich commodities for a Prefent, and to supply his wants, by a good conuoy of foure hundred Haiducks and fome Turks joyned vnto them, Which Haiducks as they were by the way to Caffovia, to passe by Tocay a strong townholden by the Christians, gaue secret knowledge vnto the Gouernour of the place, of their comming that way; and that if he would receive them into the towne, and so into his protection, I they would with some small helpe from him, deliver into his hands that so rich a booty, and fo continue with him as his faithfull and trufty fouldiers. Of whole offer the Governor well affured, forthwith fent out foure hundred of the fouldiers of his garrison to meet them twho joyning with the aforesaid Haiduckes which came with the Conuoy, set voon the Turkes which came with them, and flew them cuery mothers fonne, and fo with the rich bootywere by the Gouernour received into the Towne, and by him courteously welcommed and entertained. Where they had not long lien, but that after their woonted manner looking abroad into the Countrey, they chanced to meet with certain Companies of Botfcay his men; with whom they encountering, and having flaine of them neere about five hundred, tooke from them fi uen Waggons loded with good prouision, and thirty horses, besides much otherrich K

Christians.

But the Rebels, notwith standing these and other such like losses, increasing both in number and ftrength, still more and more in all places prevailed, but especially in the vpper part of Hungary, the townes there one after another daily revolting vnto them, as amongst the Totifa golded reft the ftrong towne of Totifa did whereinto the Rebels entering, fent from thence part of the great Ordnance, together with Relinger a Germane Captaine Gouernour of the Towne, and certaine other Germane fouldiers thete taken, wnto Redeim, Botfay his Lieutenant, then lying with a great army of thirty thouland Hungarian Rebels and Turkes, at the fiege of the frong towns and Caffle of Newhule. Which as it had oftentimes by him been fiercely affaulted, fo was it by the fouldiers therein most notably defended, protesting neuer to yeeld I the same, but to hold it out even to the last man therein to bee left alive. Which caused Redeiss for the encouraging of his fouldiers (who had now lien there certaine moneths at the siege thereof) to promise vnto them the whole spoile of the towne, and of all that therinwas. And yet for all that, oftentimes kept backe the Turkes from affaulting the same, for feare lest if they should by force have taken it, they would by force also have holden it vnto themselves, as a place for them most commodious for the conquering of that which remained of the vpper part of Hungary. Which hee, although one of the greatest Rebels, was yet loth to have it fall into their hands ; and yet himfelf, with the Haiducks the Hungarian Rebels, afterward, viz the 25 of July, gave thereunto a most furious affault; infomuch that having advanced ten of their Enfignes to the top of the Rampiers, they were in great hope even presently to M haue taken it, but yet were by the refolute valour of the defendants notably repulled, and in forced agains to retyre, leaving behind them about feven hundred of their most forward men

A dead in the trenches. Vnto which fiege the Baffa of Agria came also afterward with three thousand horsemen and a number of lanizaries; so that the besieged, partly with mines, partly with shot and often affaults distressed, were so wasted and wounded, that there were scarcely two hundred whole and found men left in the whole garrifon : befide that, both victuals and pouder begun now to grow scarce also, so that they were brought ento such extremity, as that well they could not be in worfe-case; and yet armed with a constant resolution, they seemed not to be any thing therewith danted or discouraged, but fill valiantly held it out.

The Hungarians dwelling in the Isle of Shut in the river of Danubium, having before sub- The Robels in mitted themselves vnto the Rebels, did with their helpe much trouble the passages vnto the sheefs sheet towne of Rab and Comara, and the City of Strigonium; vnto whom certains messengers selver against were fent on the Emperours behalfe to perfuade with them to for fake the Rebels and to re-perour. turne againe vnto their antient obedience. Who fo well yied the matter with them, that taking a truce for eight daies, they in the meane time fent flue of the chiefe men among fl them by thip to Presburg, offering unto the Gouernour there. That if they might be fecured of their goods and fafety, and that the Haiduckes that were with them might be entertained in pay, they would be ready againe to take the oath of allegiance and faithfulneffe to ferue him as became his loyall subjects and valiant souldiers; and for the assurance thereof, to leave their wines and children as pledges at Presburg. Which their offer was vuto the Gouernour very acceptable and welcome, who yeelding vnto their request, in friendly fort dismissed them. But they being returned home, and having declared vnto the rest of their fellowes what they C had done; it was by generall confent agreed, that foure thousand of them should joyne them. selues vnto the Emperours power under the Regiment of Collonitz, who to be knowne from others, wore in their crests certaine speciall feathers, their wives and children being carried to Presburg as pledges of their faith; but this agreement by them made with the Gouernour of Presburg being once knowne, the rest of the Rebels in the Countrey thereabout rogether assembled with the Turks, inuaded the Isle, in hope voon the sudden to have surprised them : but deceived of their expectation, were by the inhabitants of the Isle, and by the helpe of certaine Germane troupes ouerthrowne and put to flight, and three thousand of them there

About the beginning of July certaine Commissioners were sent on the Emperours behalfe D to Cossouia, to intreat with Bosses concerning a pacification to be made, who being by him there honourably entertained, and having with him staied almost a whole moneth, were at length the nine and twentieth of the same moneth againe dismissed. Now the articles which Boileay propounded unto these Commissioners to be considered of for the making of a peace, and which for the most part were agreed upon in the peace afterward concluded between the great Sultan and the Emperour, were thefe.

First, That it should be lawfull for all such as would, to have the free exercise of the refor- desicted parts medreligion. For although (as he faid) he was not ignorant that there was an antient decree fear pronounamongst the Hungarians, whereby all that professed not the Catholicke Religion, or that re-Emperaturem uolted from the same were to be burnt, and that he desired not to have that article repealed; millioners for E yet that his request was, That the Emperour having regard vnto the troubles of the present the sumultain time, would promise and affure. That from thenceforth no man should be troubled for his Re- the upper Hunligion, or called in question for his conscience and Beliefe. Besides that, he requested to have garge the Principality of Transylvania during his life; yet with this condition, That after his death it should againe returne vnto the Emperour, so that the Emperour in his absence should appoint a natural! Hungarian to gouerne the same, as also to have the chiefe government in Hungary. That there should no more Bishops sit in counsell but one, and that he, if it should be so thought meet, should beare the office of the Chancelour. That the liberty and priveledges of that Kingdome should be kept whole and inviolate. That it should be lawfull for him only to make choice of the chiefe Palatine of the Kingdome. That goods confiscated F for any offence committed, should not be dispersed or fold, but given to men of disert. That alloffenders against the State from thenceforth should be judged by the Counfell of Hungary. That none should be preferred to Bishoprickes in Hungary, but such as were of the noble Hungarian bloud. That all injuries heretofore don should be absolvely pardoned, forgiuen and forgotten. All which things if they might be granted, he promifed to labor to the vitter. G most of his power, upon the best conditions he might to procure a peace betwittithe Great Sultan and the Emperor. Last of all he requested, That the charters of peace containing these articles thus agreed vpon, might be abserted and confirmed by the Bishop of Rome, the Emperor, the King of Polonia, and all the Imperial Kingdomes and Provinces.

The Turkith Sultan understanding of this treaty of peace betwist the Emperour and Bush tou lots that c.ty by a moffenger sent in haste to Bosscay, sought by great offers and promises to hinder the tome to a peace fame: putting him withall in remembrance, that a little before this treaty made, he had not with the Em- onely by words but by letters also subscribed with his owne hand, promised unto Bosseas his Embassadors sent to Constantinople, That hee would bring to passe, that Bosses rewarded with such priviledges as King Iohn in former time enjoyed, should in shore time be proclai-H med and crowned King of Hungary, and that to that purpose he was even now ready to fend a scepter and a crowne, the ornaments of a King, to Alba. Regalis. But for the present, he by these messengers sent vnto Botseay two goodly horses, with furniture of gold, glistering with pretious stones. He sent him also a rich seimiter, a paire of golden spurs, and a long horsmans cost garnished with gold and pretious stones of great price; persuading him valiantly to perfist in his former course and purpose. Which he failed not to doc: for immediatly after, he with a gallant traine went from Caffouia into Tranfyluania, there to take of the Nobility of that Province the oath of their fidelity vnro him; accounting no paines or labor great, which he tooke to turne the people from their obedience vnto the Emperor, and to firengthen himfelfe. At which time he alfo fent Redeius his Chancellor, with fome others into Polonia, to 1 renew the confederation which was fometime betwirt the Polonians and the Hungarians: who being admitted vnto the Kings presence, and audience given him, first declared the caufes of the discord and civill war that then was in Hungary, which he imputed chiefly into the oppression of Religion, the free exercise thereof being forbidden them; and to the insolency of the Germans, who there at their pleasure commanded ouer them. Vpon which two points he flood much, labouring with many words to perfuade the King thereof: and afterwards requesting him of his gratious goodnesse, and of the care which he, together with other Christian Princes, had for the common quiet of the Christian common weale in generall, and especially of those two diffressed countries, lying as it were euen in the enemies mouth, to enter into consultation how the same cuils might be remedied, and those so great troubles again appear fed, and to the effecting of fo good a worke to put to his helping hand. Whereunto the King answered, That the friendship wherein Botseay offered to joine with him being but the renuing of the antient amity betwixt the countries of Polonia and Hungary, to be vnto him pleasing; howbeit, he could not for all that (as he faid) well like of Botfeay his revolt from that house and family, whereunto he was himselse so neere joyned in affinity; promising yet neuerthelesse, That he would propound the matter vnto his Nobility, to be further confidered of which when he had indeed done, it was by common confent agreed, That no aid should be given out of Polonia vnto Botfcay or the Rebels; and that who foeuer should from thence affoord him any aid, should therefore sofe his head. With which answer the Embassadours returned to Bustcay much discontented, being now with a great power againe returned out of Transylvania to L

7 b. Y ard Rufmerme behea.

About this time the Lord Ruffworm (sometimes Generall of the Emperours army against the Turks in Hungary, a man of great note and valor, and of whom we have before much spoken) at Prague falling into words, and from words to blowes, with Francis Count Beliojofahis brother, and their men taking their parts on both sides, it fortuned the said Francis, the Barles brother, being grieuously wounded, to be there slaine; Beliojosa himselfe being also in five places dangeroufly hurt : who so hardly prosecuted the death of his brother against the Lord Rassworm, that within a while after, hee was therefore by the Emperour condemned, and at Prague beheaded, and divers of his men hanged, with fuch weapons hanging at their heeles, as wherewith they had flaine the faid Francis the Earles brother.

Now was the time of the yeare come, when as the Turks great armies were wont to bee feene euen in the heart of Hungary : howbeit, such were their troubles in Asia, both with the Persian and their owne Rebels, that they were not at leisure now to fend such great forces

A as they had before vied, into Hungary: neither could the Christian Emperour on the other fide now raife such a power as he had in former times don to oppose against them, and to hinder their proceedings. The Hungarians themselves (his greatest strength in those wars) were now generally reuolted from him, and for most part followed the Ensignes of the Rebell Boifeay. The Princes wont to fend him aid both out of Italy and out of Germany, now affoorded him little or none at all: and his mercenary fouldiers for want of pay were now almost euery wherevo in mutiny ready to for sake his seruice, and to pay themselues with the soule of his Countries eyen to the gates of Vienna. So that had not the Turks beene so busied in the East, but at leisure to have turned their whole power into Hungary, as oftentimes they hadb, fore done, it is hardly to be imagined, what should have letted them to have over-run R not onely that which remained of Hungary, but even all Austria, with some good part of Germany also; the Emperours preparations being then so small, and his forces so weake, as that they were not able to hold the field against his owne rebellious subjects, much leffe a. gainst so puissant and dreadfull an enemy. But God which with his word hath set bounds ynto the raging sea, beyond which it cannot passe, and by whose power Kings do reigne and Princes beare rule, had by other meanes auerted the greatest part of the Turks forces Eastwards : fo that Serdar Baffa, Sultan Achmat his Lieutenant Generall for his wars against the Christians, came this yeare but with a right small army (in comparison of those which the Turkish Sultans were wont to fend) into Hungary. Howbeit, with fuch forces as hee brought, and with fuch supplies of the Rebels in Hungary as came vnto him, hee being growne fifty thousand o firong, and out of feare of the Emperours forces, came the nine and twentieth day of August to Strigonium, and with his army (part Turks, part Tattars, and part difloyall Christians) en- Strigonium becamped in the selfesame place where the Turks army had but the yeare before lodged; having fixed by the brought with him forty great pieces of battery, with all things else necessary for the siege. Neither were the Turks sooner encamped, but that the Tartars which came with them to the fiege (after their wonted manner) more defirous of prey and booty, than of honor and victory, passing ouer the river of Gran into the territory of the Christians, there spoiled and burnt all before them as they went.

The Turks in the meanetime to depriue the besieged of all reliefe to be sent unto them The Turkes down the river of Danubius, made a great bridge of boats over the river, well fortified at both make a bridge D ends thereof on each fide the river with a ftrong Corps de guard for the defence thereof, fo that of the same in nothing could that way passe to or from the besieged city. Which things much dismaicd them in the city, seeing no preparation to be made on the other side for their defence or reliefe: vea, Balta himselfe, Generall of such small forces as the Emperour had then, seeing the enemy fo ftrong, and himfelfe fo weake, began greatly to doubt of the event of this fiegerand yet neuerthelesse resolutely set downe to employ both his valour and his wisedome for the lafegard of the place, he, during the time of the fiege failed not to the vttermost of his power to shew the effects both of the one and of the other.

And now the Turks affisted with the Hungarian Rebels, had performed an exploit vpon the Thelfeef Stri-And now the Turks amitted with the Frungarian Actor of the Foreign for the fooile and pillage Lonium Boyled life of Strigonium, aswell to take the same from the Imperials, as for the sponium of the Honorov by the Hair E thereof. The inhabitants there had still remained faithfull vnto the service of the Emperor, ducki. whom the Rebels for all that had oftentimes fought both by force and by perfuafion to have remoued from this their loyalty and just denoire. Within this Isle were 200 flaiducks, returned againe to the Emperors service, who were joyned unto the Islanders, for the better defence both of them and of the Island. But the Rebels knowing well the passages and entrances into the Isle, upon the sudden surprised the same, and in it these poore Haiducks, whom they cut all in pieces: which loffe caused Basta to resolue to send the Wallons he had in his army into the Isle for the defence thereof. Which they of the Island understanding, made request unto the Generall, That he would not in any wife so doe, for that they greatly feared lest the Wallons, being men altogether given to the spoile, not finding the Rebels to prey vpon, should after their wonted manner pray vpon them, the Emperours faithfull subjects. At whose instance the former purpose for the sending of the Wallons beeing changed, Collonitz himselse was appointed vnto that service ; with whom Monnsieur de Lanal, a noble young Gentleman of France (who but a few dayes before was newly come vnto the campe for the honourable desire hee had to see service, and to serve himselse, with his troupe of horse G the honourable denie nee had to lee the leave, men whom he had brought with him out of France) went ouer into the Island also. Whereinto when as the Rebels shortly after againe entered, they were by Collonitz Ouerthrowne The Haiducker and driven out of the Isle, two hundred and fifty of them being slaine, and above fifty moe Tee Haiducker and driven out of the Inc., two maintees and the noble young Gentleman Mounfieur Land, fo brauely behaued himselse, as that he gained vnto himselse much honour and renowne, energy mans mouth being full of his prayles, and wondering to fee fo great courage in fo young yeares, he being then scarce nineteene yeares old. With which losse the Rebels rather enraged than discouraged, thortly after returned againe, in great number and better resolued; where betwixt them, and them that were left for the defence of the Island, was fought a more tharpe and bloudy fight than was the former; yet fo, as that the Rebels were enforced H againe with loffe to retyre. In which fo hot and bloudy a skirmish, Mounstear Lanal, hauing most valiantly borne himselfe against the enemy, and done enough for his honour, but not to contented, but carryed away with the heat of youth, and the defire of glory, and not otherwise to be perfuaded, but fill aduenturously pressing on the retiring enemy, was there with a small shot slaine; all they which knew him much lamenting his votimely death. But the Rebels not so discouraged, but Aill in one place or other inuading the Island, and threatening the Islanders with all extremities, except they would take part with them; what by force, what by persuasion, so much prevailed with them, that the most part of them revolting from the Emperour, vpon the fudden fet vpon the Count of Rhene, beeing then in the Island, and having slaine three hundred of his men, gricuously wounded himselfe also. For I the speedy appealing of which multitude, Basta sent ouer into the Island certaine companies of Ratzians and Wallons, who not regarding that the Islanders were dayly damnified by the Rebels, most miserably spoyled them of whatsoeuer the Rebels had yet lest

The Turks encamped before Strigonium, first planted their battery against the strong fort, standing aloft vpon S. Thomas hill: for that from thence they should have received infinit harme, if they should before the winning thereof haue attempted to haue woon the City; it standing on their backes, and all the plaine betwixt the hill and the city wherein they were to plant their battery being subject vnto it. Which fort, though very strong, they with continuall battery by the space of almost three weekes, having with infinit charge, and the losse of a number of their men, made saultable, the source and twentieth day of September mounted the hill to affault the same. Vnto which affault they went up the hill so thicke one thrusting another forward, that the hill feemed now to be nothing but a mount or heape of armed men, scarce any part of it being to be seene, it was so covered with them. Vpon whom so swarming vo, the Christians in the fort, having reposed all the hope of their welfare in their valour, and resolued thereby to die or liue, couragiously discharged their murthring shot both great and small, scarce any of their deadly bullets falling in vaine. Howbeit the Turks, resolutely set downe for the performing of that they had taken in hand, without respect of death or danger, came ftill desperatly on, untill that they were come to the push of pike, and so to handy blowes even in the very breaches, which the long fury of the Tirres cannon had made very L faultable. Fiue houres this furious affault was by the Turks maintained, and by the Christians with inuincible courage and refolution endured, many braue and valiant men falling on both sides: and thrice the Turks repulsed, were enforced to revire, but were kill by their commanders brought on agaire. The loffe was to both fides common, many worthy men their ending their daies, worthy of eternall fame. The Christians fell dead upon the Turks slaine by their valor, and the Turks vpon the Christians slaine by their multitude. Bit what should we fay? The Turks by numbers died, but not their force, that being by their great numbers ftill maintained euen in despight of death, and alwaies living in their great multitude, yet left aliue. Which was not so with the defendants, but even quite contrary; who could not lose one onely man, without diminishing of their forces, and means of refistance: so that they still M lost without hope of safegard, and yet could not be in safety, without continuing of their so great losses. But he that still fighteth only forto fauchis life, without hope of killing of hisenemy, being too mighty for him to ouercome, must needs at last die ouercome, if it were but with very wearinesse. So in the end of this long and furious assault, nine hundred of the Christians being slaine, together with the Count Octingen, their Chiefetaine, and his Lieutenant mortally wounded, and nothing now more left but a few fore hurt men, and the dead wals for the Turks to ouercome, they entered the place, flew those few whom they found yet brea. S. Thom, u first thing, made booty of their death, bloud, and armes; and by the infinite price of their owne Turke. bloud, gained that place which had now no more bloud or lite left in it. From whence they carried certaine great pieces, to helpe to batter the city withall, and to vanquish them, for whose defence they were but a little before appointed.

The Turks having thus gained S. Thomas fort, cuen as they were yet embrued with bloud, Thebase towns and prickt forward with fury, forthwith planted thirty great pieces of battery against the of Strigonium battered. base towns of Strigonium, standing low by the side of Danubius, and commonly called the Water-towne; which they with all their force and fury most terribly battered. This base towne was inuironed with a pallifado of wood, to defend it against all sudden surprises, as almost all the townes of Hungary are: Whereunto the consuled multitude of the Turks carried a number of brush saggots, stuffed with gunpouder and brimstone, which being set on fire, presently set fire vpon the pallisado also, and burnt it downe to the ground, making away for the Turks to come even to the wals of the city; which they with their great ordnance both night and day inceffantly most terribly battered, until that by the fury of the cannon they had therein made a faire and large faultable breach. A great shame for our men to suffer the same fo to be made, and not againe repaired: whereas the Turks before in the same place, had made c it good against the great army of the Archduke Mathias, being neuer to be driven and forced out of it by the Christians valour, vntill they were therein slaine; and to be now by our men through their cowardise not to be able to be made good. For why, it was even the same place of battell, the same men, the same armes, and the same forme of fight, but not the same courages. The Turks can very well learne of vs that which is for them profitable, and make vie thereof to their owne aduantage; whereas we can borrow nothing of them to serue vs against ded and relieued keepeth vs : whose boldnesse also firmely grounded vpon a resolution to die, passeth our resolution far, in fighting only to saue their lives, The breach fo made, the Turks in good order, staied upon a firme resolution, came brauely The base country marching on, one of them thrusting another, and as it were ariving among themselves who affanted. should have the honour to give the first charge, their haughtinesse of minde animating of them to seeke for honour euen where perils were rifest; so to have the honor to die amongst the most forward and valiant men of war, rather than to liue among cowards of no reputation or valor. During the heat of which their fo great and firme a refolution they regarded not the showers of deadly bullets falling amongst them as thicke as haile, as too weake to dant their haughty courages, but thrusting one another amiddest so great dangers, came vnto the breach, there to try the matter hand to hand with our men. The lanizaries were the men ef- Attrible pecially appointed to this feruice, and had taken the same upon them 3 who with their great estate. E muskets on their refts cruelly gauled our men, exposed to the danger of their deadly shot voon the brinke as it were of their own graves. The great Bassa himselfe was there present at the

them, and so profit our selues by their example. Besides that, the considence they have in their multitude carrieth them vnto fuch advantages, as from which the despaire of being secon-

affault, encouraging his fouldiers with speeches full of terrour and of comfort, as he saw occafion for either to be vied, wherewith be stirred up their valor as is a ship with a faire or rough gale of wind. Death it felfe could not ouercome these miscreams, their number still repairing in a moment what death had taken away in an houre : whereas our men flew others but to be flainethemselnes, and fought not, bur to become secrifices vnto death themselnes, and not by their resistance to carry away the victory against inexorable destiny. The fight was great and terrible, and the bullets still flew, few of them falling in vaine among st such a multitude and prease of men. They of the high towne, who themselves expected the like danger wherein their companions now floated betwirt life and death, stood about looking on, not daring to give them aide, or to remooue out of their strength, but referring themselves with all their forces for the sole safegard of themselves and of their owne desence. Howbeit all this while the enemies forces still encreased, and the Christians diminished; for death could not 00000 3 weaken theirs, whereas it fill destroyed ours, who failed but in number, not in valour, and G gaue place but vnto the force of death, and not vnto the force of men. All the deadly blowes appointed to be given for the defence of a breach, had been by our men given; all the armes necessary for such a purpose had been employed, all resistance that could be desired had been made, and all the duties of valiant and worthy men performed; so that nothing here wanted but number, and not valour. But in all fuch actions there are two things necessary, the one for the helping of the other, for the correspondency of their power; which both joyned in one body, may doe all things, but being divided, can neither of them doe any thing against him

Strigonium

In fine, after foure artempts in this affault, most of the Christian defendants being slaine, The base towns the Turks forced the rest, and gained the breach, treading wnder footshe dead bodies both H of Strigonium of the Turks and of the Christians, to get into the City. This place thus woon, and those that were lest, put to the sword, and the towne rifled , the Turks yet in breath, and all em. brued in bloud, gaue an attempt wnto the high Towne, in some hope even at that time in fo great a confusion of the defendants to have carried the same also. Howbeit, the defentowns of String of the string ons, and ready to shead theirs also, for the present notably repulsed them. Who so disappointed of their purpose, and desiring to gaine the place with the least losse they might, resolued to take the same by vadermining of it, reposing more trust in the spade and the mattocke, than in their swords and harquebusies; beeing by experience of their former sieges raught, how hard and dangerous a thing it was by battery and affault to obtaine the 1 fame. This trauell in the mynes tooke successe according to their desire a for within a few dayes the mynes (with much labour) beeing brought to perfection, and fire put vnto them, they fayled not to worke their effect, but with great violence blew up the walls, their ramps. ers, men, and munition, altogether, casting forth such smoakes and stames, as wherewith a number of the defendants were smothered and burnt. Which breaches so made and thede. sences of the City blowne up, in such fort, that the Christians lay open to the enemies deadly thot, beeing not able any more to thew themselves without danger of their lives, the Turks in order forthwith came to affault and force the same. Which the Captaines of the Christians beholding, prepared themselves to withstand them, and to that purpose would have given order vnto their fouldiers for the defence both of the breach and of the walls, K whom they found such as Eumenes at his greatest need found his, nor willing analy wife to fight, and in the most assured perill of death, without courage, either to vanquish their enemies, or defend themselves, in such fort, that not one of themseworld but themselves in order, thew themselves vpon the breach, or comonecre the walls! Lazie cowards, chusing rather to attend an affured death in their cowardife and want of courage, than to added ture their lines into the danger of armes, well deferuing to endure the fame with allille nour, seeing that they refused by honourable resistance to preserve their times. The Cap taines for all that by faire speeches and by threats ceased not to filtrethem vp splaying; exhorting, and sometime with death theatening them, if they thus refused to doe their dety, and with their naked swords in their hands would have ensorred them to the breath. L But all invaine; their dead courages beeing not to be reused or thired up in their fogicat a feare of death: Which much diffusied the Captaines, feeing their lines and honour, togither with the place (through this tumult and cowardife of their louldiers) tobelin extreame perill. During which time the Turks comming on, had without any great religible gained the foot of the breach : whom the fouldiers now feeing fo neere winto them, and out of hope to be relieued, and destitute of courage also, in stead of trusting vnto their armer and valour, betooke themselves vnto the resugoof their thame and cowardise. For compassing in the Count Dampierre, Gouernour of the place, they would by reasons have persuaded him to have yeelded, and by threats have feared him from further relifting of the effective to have yeelded, and by threats have feared him from further relifting of the effective to have yeelded, and by threats have feared him from further relifting of the effective to have yeelded, and by threats have feared him from further relifting of the effective to have yet and the second of the effective to have the second of the effective to have the effective to h my. Their fury emboldened them, proceeding not from their valour, but from their feare; M florming against their Generall for not beeing a coward, as they themselves were; trembling for feare of their enemies, and infulting against him. They had but one man of him to fight against, which made them furious and hardy shardy with cowardife against one,

A not daring to hold up their weapons against their enemies being many. Howbeit the Count Thebrane refein the middle of these serraged, continued firme in his resolution, his courage encreafing in this Corme of mutiny, withing rather to die by the hands of his owne fouldiers, in weren of sirtthe performing of his duty, than to be faued by the Turks in the bottome of his dishonour, tonium. Which his to braue a resolution caused him euen in the middest of these surious and tumultuous companies, to put them in minde of their duties, and to persuade with them: That the perill they so much feared, was greater through their owne feare, than indeed it was: that onely their fearefull apprehension made the danger, and not the action that was by them to be performed; seeing that it was impossible for the enemy to one reome them, if they would, but resolutely stand upon their valour to resist him. That all things resting but in opinion, were by themselves to be subdued, if they had but the defire to overcome them, and yet of power to ouerthrow them, if they would yeeld to their dishonour. That therefore they should propound ento themselves the honor and the shame that was to ensue ento them, by the different deportment of themselues in this action, how much the deformity of the one differed from the beauty of the other, and afpire vnto the honour which their enemies had sometimes got in the same place, and in the very same action wherein they were now, for having, with leffe appearance of their fafety ouercome the like danger, wherein their holding out had made them victorious with honour, without any great fight at all. That it should be an eternall infamy unto them, that the Turks should furmount them in their resolution, in an action wherein they ought to thew themselves most valorous; and by their cow-C ardife become subject vato them, whom at other times they had accounted voworthy to be compared with them in valour. That they should lay their hands vpon their hearts, and remember their estate and faith; bound vnto the first by their honour, and to the second by their duty. That they were men of Warre, living by their pay, which bound them to the femice of him from whom they received it, even vnto death; having before obliged their lines onto their pay : and that they were Christian subjects, bound to keepe their promise giuen by oath before God. That forgetting either the one or the other of these things, they deprined themselues of the pay promifed to them which performed their feruice; and lofing their renowne in this world for their cowardife, and in the World to come for breaking their faith. That therefore they should continue constant in the performance of their duty, resol-D uing with shamselnes rather to endure an honourable death, vinto which belonged the recompence of an exernall same for their valour and fidelity; than to prolong a miserable life with perpetuall infamy for their cowardife : whereof for all that, they could no more affire themfelues by the yeolding up of the place; than by the defending thereof, for as much as the Turks were oft rintes even asservell upon them that yeelded, as those that resisted; keeping no faith with the Christians, but as best stood with their profit and their pleasure. And that therefore for his part, he was rufulued, rather to die with honour in the place, than to be beholder to his enemies for an infamous and miferbale life. And that therefore he befought them to follow him in this last action of their denotes, which carried with it all the trophies of their precedent actions wherein they had oftentimes affilted him in many actions of leffe worth, and of E much greater perillural gained non blee This discourse grounded upon so good reasons, and proceeding for so great valour, might Most shamefull have prevailed with any other generous mindes, except with thefe degenerate fouldiers, who constilled hytheir comardife had hardened themselves against all the points of honour which might My way moone them; an fuch for that they flood as falt in their bale cowardife as did their fraperall in his valorous and conflant tefolution. They flood with their hands be binde them, mithous any strapono in thom, as was their minds without any courage at all : and as men appointed to be scriffced vpowthourar of death, without moouring, but the hands of shout that flould factifice them. Great and mameleffe cowardife, not daring by refillance to wichthand the violence of their enemies, for feare of hindering them in their delires, being indeed lisch as had vowed their death to fatisfie their owne fury. Meane while fome of thefe fouldiers feeing their speeches to be but value, and not able to moone their Gouernour to fatisfic their defire, conceived the fame their requelts, with the reasons thereof, into writing, which they sent vinto him. Which the Governour having read, in their fight rore the letters in pieces, and trode the same under his feet; rejecking as wellitheir demands by letters, G as he had done their requests by words. In briefe, having forgotten nothing of the duty of as ne had done then requests by the day a worthy Generall, and valiant Captaine, joyned now thereunto the office of a fimple fouldier, going himselfe vnto the breach, with some few to desend the same. But the more the Count flood vpon this his fo great resolution, the more these cowardly and mutinous villaines proceeded in their base obstinacy, in so much that they fell from prayers, to sury and rage, threatening to deliuer him their Gouernour, together with the place, vnto the Enemy, to faue their lives, if he himselfe would not by treaty save them from the imminent perils; If these base cowards were before deafe vnto the just remonstrances of their Gouernour, which might haue preserved them from death and infamy, he was also as deafe as they; to conceine their requests, or to be mooued with their threats; knowing that he had more reason on his H fide, by constant valour to withstand the wicked and shamefull resolution of his foldiers, than they had with dishonour to enforce him, or to offer him violence, to their eternal! shame and

In the meane time these obstinate and enraged cowards proceeded from words to deeds. and from requests to violence, as did oft times the disloyall fouldiers of Rome, in flaying the good Emperors. For they in cruell manner without reuerence, by force layed hands upon the Gouernor, put him in prison, and afterwards craving parley, fell to treaty with the great Bassa about the delinery vp of the place. Wherewith the Baffawell contented, fenr invito them The conditions Haly Baffa, to conclude the matter. Where after some little talke, it was agreed; That they should deliuer vp the place (which was not indeed theirs to dispose of) and that the Baffa I should therefore promise and suffer them with bag and baggage in safety to depart whither they would, with their enfignes frilled up, and fire in their matches, leaving behinde them their great ordnance, with all their other munition and warlike promision. Which only conposition by the perfidious souldiers made in the absence and indurance of their Generall, was by the Turks faithfully kept, among it a thousand others like before by them broken whether it were in respect of the casie conquest of the city, (being one of the chiefe and principall places of all Hungary) or for that they being ouer joyed with the gaining of that which they had fo long defired, and now fo little hoped for, they forgat their wonted cruelty and breach of

This city thus yeelded the third of Ochober, and the Turks forgetting their wonted cro-k elty, according to their faith and promise before given, in safety conducted these enwards fouldiers within a league of Comora, helping them by the way to carry their fiele and wornded men, together with their fardles, which the Turks of stimes carried vpon their own shoulders. These cowards which thus went our, with their Gouernor sent out also with them, were in number a thousand whole and found men, fitted whilst they were in the city, with all things necessary for their honour, and defence of the place; but themselves destince and void of all honour and courage. A thousand, which all together were not worth their Governor alone, feeing that in him alone there remained more valour than in all that whole multisude. Main of the Inhabitants which had there long dwelt, would not for fake the place, burby the lettle of the Turks there remained still; the rest which would not, having leave in safety to depute I whither they would.

Thus this famous City of Strigonium, one of the strongest bulwarkes of Christendente against the Turks, which the Christians had now holden by the space of ten years and die moneth, after that it was by Count Charles Mansfelt won from the Tintke, when as it had long time before beene in the Turks possession, woon from the Christians by Sistean Solyman, not againe (as is before faid) fell into the power of the Torks, with three fere and ten percent of great ordnance, and a wonderfull deale of other warlike provision and be seed and of bestied

These base and cowardly Souldiers, together with the Counceheir Gouelman, being come to Comora, were justly despoyled both of their honour and of their armes, and fent backe agains to Presburg, where curfed and detelled of all the World, and especially M of the Hungarians, themselves (who although they were revolted from their alleagentee toward the Emperour, yet could they not but much detest their so shamefull and notable cowardise) were there the chiefe of them committed to prison; where after they had to "

a certaine time lien, and being brought to indgement, and connicted of treason, in delivering vpthe city of Strigonium vnto the Turks, & infodoing to have greatly damnified the Chrifilan commonweale, they were therefore condemned, and according to the quality of their offences, diverfly in this manner executed. Captain Leonard Fredericke Schleker had his judgement, first to have his right hand cut off, and his tongue drawne out behinde in his necke, and both of them nailed to the gallowes, and afterwards to bee hanged; howbeit through the intercession of many of his friends he was not hanged but beheaded. Iohn Michael Scorer, John Hopfi, Adam Lindawar, Philip Dur, and Caffer Lielharter, all Captaines, were adjudged to have their right hands first cut off and nailed to the gallowes, and afterward hanged, but through the intercession of County Mansfield, they were hanged, and their hands not cut off. Iohn B Lautenberger was condemned to bee quartered aline; but was at the intercession of County

Munsfield, first beheaded and afterward quartred John Discoff with eleuen other were only hauged. Laurence Marshall was enjoyned to serue two yeares against the Turks as a common souldier, without pay; but through the intercession of County Manssield had one yeare pardoned him. Ieremy Strelin, with divers other, which were either fled, or elfe remained fill in Strigonium, were judged, their names to be set upon the gallows, and being afterwards caught, some of them to be quartred, and other some their hands to be cut off, and nailed vpon the gallows and afterward hanged. And thus these disloyall captains, by shunning of an honourable death indefence of Strigonium, and performing of their duty, by negle Ging the fame, procured vnto themselves a most shamefull death, attended upon with perpetuall insamy and dishonour.

But as the losse of this strong place was vnto the Christians heavy and grieuous, so was it to the Turks no leffe pleafing and joyfull; it being the place they had of long about al others desired, and whereat they had ever since the losse thereos, with their great armies in Hungary, for the space of ten yeares still aimed, Howbeit this their joy endured not long, their prospetitle beeing too hot to hold out without some cooling blast of aduerse fortune. For the same report of Fame, which with the right hand present d vnto the Great Sultan at Constantinople, the pleasing newes of the winning of Strigonium in Hungary, euen with the left hand deliuered likewise vnto him the melancholic report of the ouerthrow of his great armies in Asia, with the losse of Damasco the greatest city of Syria. For, to begin with the greatest sirst: The King of Persia, inuaded by Cicala Bassa, Sultan Achmat his great Lieutenant in Asia; and D hearing that the Bassa of Caramania had expresse charge, with all speed to come viito him with a great supply of souldiers to be taken up in Caramania and the countries thereabout: be then having a puissant army on foot, before prepared for all events, presently set forward against Cicala: whom he comming upon before he was ready to fight, by his vnexpected com- Cicala Basilia ming, and sudden charge, ouerthrew his army, and tooke from him all his great Ordnance. Ci- with his army, tala himfelfe with three hundred fouldiers, with much ado escaping and retyring himselfe to the Perfit king. Adena; which city the Peruan King, pursuing Cicala, shortly after streitly besieged. With which valuekie newes Sultan Achmat much trouble d, forthwith writ vato the Baffa of Trebezond, with all speed to send aid vnto Cicala: who taking vnto him some other of the Turks Commanders, with a great army fet forward on his journey. Of whose comming Cicala hearing, the better to direct the Bassa in his proceeding, caused himselfe with ten of his souldiers whom he best trusted, secretly by night to be let downe over the wals of the city. And so comming to the Bassa, together with him kept on his way to joyne battell with the King as necre unto the city as he could, for that he had taken order before he came out of the City, that for soone as they should perceive the battell to be joyned, they should forthwith fally out upon the backs of the Persians, and so by holding them with a doubtfull battell, to further the vistorie. All which the Persian King, hearing of the Bassacs comming, wisely doubting, and not willing to forfake the fiege, divided his army, and leaving one part thereof to continue the fiege, went himselfe with the other to meet the Baffa. Wherein hee vsed fuch expedition and The Baffa of speed, that with all his power falling upon him before he could put his men in order, or range empired.

his battell, he made of the Turks (now confusedly and without all order fighting more for the fafegard of their lives, than for any hope they had of victory) fuch an exceeding great flaughter, that few of them escaped, but were there almost all slaine. Cicala himselfe but with two or three moe, having much ado by getting into a little boat, and fo by paffing over the river, to escape the danger. Afterwhich victory so easily gained, the King returning againe to the G fiege, after many tharpe and great affaults thereunto given, and many men on both fides loft,

Now with this news of the loffe of his armies, and of the victories of the Persian King, Sul tan Achmat enraged, caused Cicala Bassa his house at Constantinople, ful of treasure & wealth, to be rifled; after the manner of the world, deeming of the doings of him fo great a Captaine, according to the cuent and euill successe thereof, though not in his power to have been remedied: neuerthelesse shortly after, he caused great summes of mony to be deliuered out of his treasures, and new forces raised for the renewing of the warre against the Persian King. Vnto which service (now become vitto the Turks dreadfull) when as many of the Ianizaries were to be appointed, they after their proud and insolent manner, all arising up in mutiny, said flat. H ly, That they would not stirre one foot out of Constantinople, except they were both before band payed, and affured also to have their wages encreased : complaining grieuously withall, of the Bassa of Damasco, the Great Sultan his high Treasurer, that he converting the Sultans treasures to his owne vse, did not pay the souldiers their wages due. For the appearing of which mutiny and tumult, the Sultan caused the same Bassa to be apprehended and his head strucken off, and so with the price of his bloud againe appealed them.

But leaving the Persian King triumphing in his victories, and the Great Sultan grieving at his losses, let ve turne aside into Siria, to see the troubles the Turks had euen among themfelues, to the weakening of their State, and the encreasing of the Great Sultans cares & griefe, The two Baffa's of Damasco and Aleppo had (as is before declared) been at great discordand I variance betwist themselues, and the Bassa of Aleppo in field ouerthrowne, and in his city befieged, glad to make peace with the other Baffa, by yeelding vnto all fuch things as it pleafed him to demand. Which two Baffa's for all that being diverfly affected vnto the Sate, long agreed not, he of Damasco continuing faithful in his allegiance towards the Great Sultan, and the other of Aleppo secretly inclining vnto Rebellion. Which the Bassa of Damasco perceiuing, and joyning vnto him the Bassa's of Tripolis and Gazare, with their vnited forceswent against the Bassa of Aleppo, leading with them 60000 good men, with purpose to have besseged the Baffa of Aleppo his enemy, in his city. But he betimes aduertifed of this his designe, and not unprouided for his comming, quickely called together his Forces, and had in very fhort time raised an army of thirty thousand valiant men, whom he encouraging, and finding K them willing to follow him whitherfoeuer he would lead them, marched directly towards his enemies; with whom he meeting, readily joyned battell with them, which was fought with fuch fury and hideous noise, as if it had been two thunder claps opposing each other in one cloud, striuing of themselves, which should burst out first, being like people, like armes, and like order of fight. The medley for a great time continued that pe and furious, the number of the one fide counternailing the valour of the other, and the others valor ballancing the others great number: howbeit in the end the lone Baffa ouercame the other three, and the smaller number the greater, and putting them to flight, remained sole victors of the field. Now the vistorious Bassa, as wise to vse the victory, as heewas valiant to obtaine the same, so eagerly. pola, and Ga. pursued them, that without giving them leave to breathe, hee besieged Tripolis, the Basia L whereof at his comming abendoned the same, and carrying with him all his treasure, fled in Baffa of Aleppo. to Cyprus, which made the taking of the place vnto the victorious Bassa casie, who risted and ransacked the same : and not content with this conquest, forthwith besieged the great and strong city of Damasco, resolued to die in the plaines thereof, or to become victorious within the walls of the same. During which siege, the Bassa of Tripolis had out of the provinces and countries of the Turks thereabouts, raifed another great army, and was comming toraise the fiege, and to rescue the City. Whereof the Bassa of Aleppo hearing, rose with the greatest part of his army, and meeting with him, gaue him battell, and therein the second time ouerthrew him and pur him to flight. Which misfortune fo difmaied the minds of the befieged, that despairing of all succour and reliefe, they by consent of their Gouernor fell to parly M Donales taken with the enemies, and fo vpon certainecapitulations yeelded vnto him the place. Whereinto e ristedorthe the Bassa entering, found therein great treasure, raised of the Turks tributes, whereupon he scised, and by the meanes thereof resolued to make himselse Master of all Syria, the chiefe

A city whereof he had now in his owne power; whereunto he gaue free accesse and traffique vn. to all the Merchants of Persia and of the Indies.

Now in the time of this his prosperity, newes was brought him, That the Beglerbeg of Natolia had fent his Lieutenant with a great Army against him, who knowing that diligence was the spirit of conquest, and that to conquer was to little purpose, without a vigilant care for the preservation thereof, rested not upon his former good fortune, but marched directly towards his enemics. Wherein his successe was answerable to his designe, for within the space of two dayes hee had taken all the passages which might give way vnto his enemies to distresse him : and in the streights of the mountaines, whereby the enemy was to passe, layed a great ambush of two thousand harquebusiers and three thousand horse, who, the enemies being paffed, and hee charging them a head, fet vpon them in the rereward, The Bielerbee and brought fuch a feare vpon them, that having made a great fight, in fine, they having that the treatment that the property of the best of the lost a number of men, were glad to fly, and to leave the Victory vnto the Bassa. And to the with his drencreasing of his good happes, hee intercepted a Ship, cast by weather vpon that Coast, la. my difcomf-dad with great treasure hound from Alexandria to Constantinople with the tribute of tribute as ded with great treasure, bound from Alexandria to Constantinople with the tributes of saf sleppe, Ægypt, belonging to the Great Sultan. Of all which things the Persian King aductifed, fought to joyne with him in amity, highly commending all his valiant acts, and fending vnto him honourable Presents; to wit, a Pistoll, an Helmet, and a Targuet, all set with pretious stones, esteemed to bee worth fifty thousand Crownes. This slame of rebellion spread abroad out of Syria, into Caramania, and so farther and farther into the leffer Asia. e Which was the cause that the Great Sultan sent with all speed vnto the Visier Bassa, then in Hungary; commanding him, now that Strigonium was taken, which before had hindered the concluding of peace, hee should now upon reasonable conditions conclude the same, to the end that his affaires on this side of his Empire beeing set in quiet and security, hee might forthwith after turne his Forces against the Persians and the Rebels in

But after all these great troubles, to return agains into Hungary. The Robels there had of long befreged the strong Towng of Newhuse, as is before declared which being hitherto valiantly defended by the German garri on therein, was now brought to fuch extremity, as that it was thought almost impossible to be longer defended, the garrison souldiers there-D in being with often affaults for the most part slaine, and the rest of them that were left, grieuously wounded. Of which strong Towne (beeing as it were the Key of that side of the Countrey) the Turkes which together with the Rebels belieged the same, were for the commodious scituation thereof very defirous; and the Rebels thereunto as vnwilling, for that it being once in their hand, would hardly euer bee againe from them recoursed. For which cause Illishascias one of the Captaines of the Hungarian Rebels then at the siege thereof, perceiving it could not be long kept, to the intent that the Turks should not by force obtaine the same, by Letters requested of Basta the Emperours Lieutenant, though then his enemy, That the Towne might be delinered vnto Humanoim, another Captaine of the Hungarian Rebels, left the Turks should by force obtains the same : affuring him upon the perill E of his owne life, and the confiscation of all his goods to the Emperour, that vpon a reconciliation and peace to be made betwirt the Emperour and the Hungarians his subjects, hee should againe deliuer the same Towne and Fortresse into his possession. Whereupon by Newbole red. commandement of the Archduke and of Basta, the Towne was yeelded up the seuenteenth day ded wate the of the Moneth of O ctober, vnto the afore aid Humanoius, and the Hungarians only received but. into the towne; yet with this condition, That the Germane fouldiers which were yet left, and who had valiantly thus long endured the fiege, might still stay in the towne in pay, and keepe watch and ward together with the rest of the Hungarians, Humanois having command over them all.

Wherefore the Turks feeing themselues disappointed of their purpose, for the obraining of this strong Towne, rising by night, and not a little discontented with the Hungarians, marched towards Strigonium, at the fiege whereof the Visier Ballay. Howbeit within a few dayes after, the Hungarians not liking to have the Germane. in garrifon with them, turned them with their Captaine Strenius out of the Towne, and yet fafely conducted them to Comara.

At the same time they of Altensoll, another frong towns of the upper Hungary, not same G from Neuhuse, having bin long besieged by the Rebels, and driven for want of victuall toeat their horses for the space of flue weeks; and having now eaten them all but seven, and nothing else lest, yeelded themselves together with their towne to the Rebels : as did also they of ro mismi:

In the meane time Botseay with a very great army of his Hungarian Rebels, came to Tyir. na, a strong towne about sixteene miles distant from Vienna, attended vpon with a guard of an hundred tall fouldiers, gallantly apparelled all in blew: a little before whose comming. Humanoius, vnto whom Neuhuse was a little before yeelded, had summoned Presburg, requiring the same to be yeelded vnto him. Which thing Bosscoy, being now come, by Letters likewise required of the Citisens, threatning otherwise most streightly to besiege them, H Whereupon Schonberg Gouernour of Presburg, doubting of the faithfulnesse of the Citisen, being almost all Hungarians, retired himselse with a good part of his souldiers into the Cafile; with protestation, to spend his life and all that he had for the keeping and defence there. of. With whose constancy the Citisens mooued, continued firme in their allegiance vnto the Emperour. Which Boiseay perceiuing, and that the City was not to be got by threats, forthwith remooued and went to Pefth, where he was most honourably received by the Visier Baffa, and by him presented with a crowne of curious workemanship, and threescore thousand duckats, with flue and twenty most goodly horses; and there having received from him full power to entreat of peace, and to conclude the same with the Imperials, with Haly Bassand certaine other of the chiefe of the Turks joyned in Commission with him, againe departed I and went to Kyrpa, vnto an affembly of the Hungarians there to be holden: whitherbura little before Sigifmund Forgatt was come with the Emperors resolution, concerning the negotiation of peace; when as in the meane time other Commissioners from the Emperourwere come to Comara about the treaty of peace with the Turks, they themselves so requiring, Howbeit Colloniez at the same time by letters writ unto the Archduke, aduising him that this treaty of peace might not, together and at one time, be taken in hand with the Turks and the Rebels: but that if it were possible, an attonement should be first made with the Rebels, and afterward a peace concluded with the Turks; the common good of the common weale fo requiring: for that he perceived the Turks indeed not to be defirous of peace at all, but only to go about, by keeping the Christians at variance among themselues, and in suspence betwirt K hope and feare, to do them harme, and themselues good; which was afterward found to be so

The Persian King had some moneths before sent three Embassadours vnto his Imperial Majesty, who being come at divers times one after another, were all with peculiar letters difmissed from Prague the 29 of November. Vnto the first of which Embassadours Letters were given of this purport.

The Emperors

A treaty of

Zinel Chan Beg whom your Majesty hath sent Embassadour unto us, we have willingly seens and received, and given him audience, in declaring of (uch things as he had from you in charge. It is vnto us both acceptable and pleafing, that your Majesty hath regard, so friendly to falute us, and so care- L fully to secketo joynein amity and friendship with vs, whereby your Majesty much bindeth us wat the like defire of mutuall love and friendship, and that we againe on our parts should be ready to performe fucht bings as may be unto your Majesty pleasing : and that we should wish for nothing more, than that our friendship should dayly more and more be confirmed, and for the common good of us both, for many yeares preserved : wherein we for our parts will not be wanting. Whereas your Majesty with great courage hath undertaken, and with so happy successe of wittories continued your warres against the Turke, whereof you had fo just cause, we from our hearts in your behalfe, rejoyce as all other Christians worthily doe : and we our filues are thereby much animated valiantly and constantly to proceed in our warres, which we now so many yeares baue made with the same enemy, nothing doubting but that God the revenger of wrong will so proper the honourable endeauours of your Majefly, as that you shall M not onely recour such things as have beene wrong fully taken from you, but also weaken and destroy the power of that perfidious enemy. Which that it may the better bee brought to paffe, wee also renew our warres, raise greater forces, and by our Embassadours and Letters exhort and incite the greatest Christian Princes and Potentates to extend their power against this our common enemy : and

A thereby to give fitter opportunitie and occasion unto your Maiesty for the better proceeding of your affairs in Afia. The course of our notable wittories which wee have in few yeares past obtained against the Turkes, the sumults and troubles which the Turks have by fecret devices raifed in Hungary , have somewhat hindred : bowbeit we hope by Gods permision, that all things shall shorely be again restored to their former estate, fo that wernay wholly wat hout let turn our schues with our power against the Turkes. Yet in the mean time we have thus much prepailed with the King of Spaine, as that hee hath already fet forth a fleet unto the borders of his territories, to distract his forces, the prosperous successe of which Fleet we daily expect. We have also mooned the Pope, that he should also give aid in this common Cause, and excite other Princes alfoto do the like; which he with great endeauor doth. But concerning such things as fall hereafter happen, we foall by Letters and Embaffadors certific your Maiefly as occasion fall re-R quire : as efilias prefent me had appainted to fend unto youthe Baron of Dobna, a famous and noble centleman, who (all things being ready for his courses) Suddenly died. And would now have lens another. had not the unexpected change of the affairs of the orde fourts otherwise diffunded vi, we having no other way but that at this time tafand into Parfia. Far concerning this great Prince which is now reported to reignthere sphat his minde is, or how he standeth affected, we have as yet no experience. In the mean time wee fo defire a parpetuall and firme friendship betweene us and your A sielty, with a certain fecure and fice compaging, that if in a Maiely (which we wish), shall extend your will aries who the fea, your sub-icts may have free accessed and traffique come all our King domes and Dominions. We also thanke your Maiely, that you so kindely entertaine the Christians into your King domes, and grant unto them to have the free exercise of their Religion. As also for that you bane fent your Embaffadours unto the King of OF Traice, all hough mithous willing successing them whome your Maiestes great care and circumpleting enterly many in As concerning them whome your Maiest hath see water us, they have diligious and faithfully performed their duty for that they have discreted praise and favour both here and in the favour many much sympted unto your Maiesty, have discreted praise and favour both here and in the favour many much sympted unto your Maiesty, to whom in all things we offer our greatest love and the first in the favour many continued to the symptems.

and divide Vato the fecond Embaffador were also given Letters from the Emperor, to this effect.

Whilest we were get bufied in the dispatch of Zinel Chan Bog, your former Embassader, in the mean sime Methi Culi Bog another Embassador of yours came quito jus , whom we have curteously entertained, and gracionly beard. By whose speech, as also by your Maiesties letters, wee have with exceeding great pleasure under flood both your friendly greeting of us, as also of the happy successe of your affaires against the Turks since the departure of your former Embassador, tagether with your kinde affestion toward the Christians in those parts. One of the servants also of our Embassadour which died by the way, hath reported unto us, how curteously our faid Embassador was by your Maiesly received; and how you have showed your selfe affected against the common Enemy : which was unto us a thing both acceptable and pleasing. Unto both which your embassies the more folemnly to answer we had appointed again to fend an honorable embassage unto your Maiesty had not these lets and impediments hapned, which in our Let-E tersgiven unto your former Embassador are declared. But fo soon and as often as may be, we will indeavor either by letters or Embaffadors, more at large to manifest our love and affection toward you. Wherefore we greatly defire that your Maiefly may continue in perfect amistic with us, and valiantly proceed in fubduing of the common enemy we on our part being ready to perform all things wherby we may tellifie unto you the desire we have for the preservation of our mutual love and friendship, as also of our endeauors in our wars against him. God almighty long preserve your Maiesty in health, and make you still victoriou d. gainft the common enemy.

> Vnto the third Embassador were likewise Letters given from the Emperor of this purport.

Whereas Ius Baffi Haffan Beg, your Maiesties Embaffadour unso the French King, came this way. at the fame time that other two of your Embaffadors were heere prefent with us ; wee received him with the same curtesie wherwish we received them, making stay of him vintill they might all three be together G ine same curvesse we verwise we recommend was undertaken for the further ance of the common good, though it wanted the wished successe, yet we have thought it good to give thanks unto your Maieste, and in most it wanteasne wispeasuccesse, yet we have everyone to gove the general want of your manester, and in most friendly maner to greet you by this your said Embassador, whom we highly commend to you, for that for the time he here staid in our court, he so behaved himselfe, as that he well descrued both our and your Mise. These Embassadors with these letters thus dismissed, one of them went into Polonia, and there declared vnto the King the great lone and affection of the Persian King toward him, of fering vnco him all loue and kindnelle: first requesting him, That he would join with his Ma. jestie in all friendship and brotherly loue : and then, That he would take vp armes against the Turks their common enemy: promiting on his mafters behalfe. That he should not lay down arms vntill that the enemy were vtterly brought to nought and destroicd fo that the Christian princes would on the other fide likewife impugn him. This was a firange meffage, and not before heard of in Polonia, where for all that the messenger was currectally and bountifully entertained, and afterwards with good words put in hope of obtaining what he had requelled,

The Turks and

But leaving these Embassadors vinto their long journey, to return again into Hungary. A Hangarian Re-bett by the Im. great number of the Turkes and Hungarian Revels meeting together at Hidweg, had a purpose secretly to have surprised and oppressed the Imperial foldiers in their camp. Of which their purpose they in good time advertised, and therfore keeping strong Watch and ward to received the Turks and Rebels at their comming, contrary to their expectation, as that after a small fight they caused them to fly : whom the Imperials so hotly pursued towards Canifia, that they flew of them aboue a thousand, tooke about two hundred more of them prisoners, with fifteen hundred horses which they caried away with them: and so having lest fufficient garisons on that side of the countrey towards Canisia, returned themselves towards Vienna. In the mean time the Emperors Commissioners being met together at Comora, about the treaty of peace with the Turks and the Hungarians, the fixe of December receiving letters from the Baffa of Buda, certaine of them the next day after went by water down the river of Danubius to Buda : where they being honorably received, and having with the Baffa much and long talke concerning a peace, found little difficultie therin, but that the Turks faid they could therof determine nothing, without the prefence and confent of the Hungarians. With which answer they ful of hope returned backe again to Comora, as did also sigifmund Forgat, with the like hope of peace from Bosscay. At which time Bosscay beeing about to depart from the affembly at Kirpay, back again to Cassovia, gaue power to illishascian for the furtherance of the treaty for peace. Who having received letters of fale conduct from the Archduke Matthias, about the end of December, together with his wife went to Vienna who being admitted vnto the Archdukes presence, and having had an houre and a halfestalk with him, and enery day after conferred with the Counfellors from eight a clock to twelve, at the L length composed all difficulties and differences touching the treaty, of peace, excepting five Articles onely concerning Religion, the free exercise whereof the Hungarians in any wise required. So that now men began to conceive some good hope of a peace to be in time concluded.

This year thus ending with the beginning of the treaty for peace, the next year began with The Haiducker the wonted troubles of war, the rebellious Haiducks doing great harm in the upper Hungadogreat barme ry, tyrannifing after their wonted maner vpon men of all forts and conditions. Where affaulting divers cities, and being valiantly repulled, they were confirmined to retyre by the Polonian Coffacks defending the fame: yet did they neuertheleffe no little harm vnto the Country inhabitants. Wherof complaint being made to the King of Polonia, he by his Emballa- M dor sent to Bosseay at Cassovia, obtained, that those spoiling Haiducks should be called back again out of those parts.

Now had Illishafins the negotiator for the treaty of peace to bee made with the Rebels, for well dealt in that matter, as that the same in the later end of Ianuarie should have been pub. The fee extrlished at Vienna, but that certaine of the chiefe of the Clergy could not be brought to con-tife of rel gion listed at Vienna, our that certaine of the chiefe of the Ciergy could not be brought to confert, that the free exercise of Religion should indifferently be granted to all the people in generall, but vnto the Nobilitie onely. Whereupon Illishasting with the rest of the Commission oners for the Hungarians, with great discontenement being about to return home again without any thing at all concluded the Deputies for the Emperor feeing that it could not otherwife be brought to passe, at length agreed (although neuer so much contrary to the good liking of the Clergy-men) to satisfie the Hungarians in this their request, and that the free exercise as well-of the Reformed as of the Romish Religion, should bee permitted to all men thorowout all Hungary, in such fore as they had before beene in the time of the Emperours B Maximilian and Ferdinand. Concerning which point for the free libertie of Religion, Letters were deliuered vnto Illishascius; all the other points concerning the peace beeing put off untill the next affembly of the chiefe States of Hungary, shortly after to be holden at the city of Presburg.

About the beginning of March, the Spahi at Constantinople had requested of the Visier Bassa, That it might bee lawfull for themselues to take up their woonted Pension of the Farmers and husbandmen here and there in the Countrey. Which although it were vnto them by the Visier Bassa denied, (who had commaundement from the great Sultan, within a few daies after to give every one of them his present pay in ready money) yet they not so contented, but going out of the city, prefumptuoufly prefumed to trouble the countrey men, and e todo the Farmers great harm. For which their insolencie the great Sultan (the chiese Captaines and leaders of them being again returned into the City) caused them some to bee beheaded, some to be hanged, and other some to be bound in chains and drowned: whereby no small searwas struck into the rest of the common souldiers. But the rebellion in Asia still increasing, and the rebels there secretly both favouring and furthering the proceedings of the Persian King, the Sultan forthwith sent for the Visier Bassa, who the last yeare had served in Hungary, to go into Asia to represse the Rebels there, and also to withstand the proceedings of the Persian King:committing in the mean time the managing of the war in Hungary vnto

The treaty of peace both with the Turkes and the Rebels was yet in hand; whereunto how D much the Turks were for their part inclined, the garrifon fouldiers of Rab had good proofe: for the eighteenth day of March, being the day at their request appointed for the treatie, and wheron the Commissioners on both parts there meeting together, should have furthered the negotiation of the peace, not past fifty of the Turkes comming to the gate of the towne, required to be let in, as if they had come for that purpole. Whom our men nothing suspecting, were about to receiue them into the town : when as a Sentinel without the town (it beeing a thicke mist) perceived three thousand more of the Turks lurking there by : and forthwith giuing an alarm to those of the town, bewraied the enemies treachery; who therupon retyred, they of the rown discharging their great ordnance after them. The next moneth about the beginning of Aprill certain messengers came from Eperia (a E City seated in the vpper Hungary, yet holden for the Emperour) to Vlenna, declaring the most miserable state of that city: which although the way therunto being three or sour weeks before opened, it had received fome good store of victuals, yet now (as they faid) was so on every fide befer by the Rebels, as that no provision at all could more therunto come hoping by that means to bring to passe, that the citisens pinched with hunger and want of things neceffarie, should at length yeeld themselves together with the city into their power. By which means they but a little before had obtained the strong town of Tokay; wherin the famin was fo great, that the Bidiers had not only eaten their shooes and leather jerkins, but had now also killed two boyes to eat, and some others of them had cast lots amongst themselves, which thould be kild for the other to eat. By which extremitie Ruber the Gouernor of the place was Total taken by inforced to yeeld. Vnto whom Bot scay, who then lay at Cassovia, is said to have offred a great the Rebell. fumme of mony, with many other good things, to have taken his part : all which he most conflantly refused, protesting, even vnto death to continue faithfull in his obedience to the Em-

About the same time Illishaschius, who had before not a little laboured about the surthe. G ring of the peace in Hungarie, writ letters from Cassouia vnto a certaine great man at Vien. na; whereby he declared, that Boiseay withour the consent of the Estates of Hungarie could of himselfe determine nothing concerning the conclusion of the peace: who had oft times to'd him to his face, that rather than they would againe submit themselues to a foreine Go. uernour, they would for euer put themselves under the Turks protection; and yet promised by the same lettters, that although he had got vnto himselfe great displeasure thereby with the Haiduckes, he would not for all that cease by all meanes to draw the States of the coun. try in their next affembly vinto his part, fo that that which was before concluded at Vienne concerning Religion, should not againe be reversed for many of them (as he said) were afraid that it would not be performed, which was there promifed vnto the States concerning # the exercise of their Religion. And that therefore they could not yet bee perfuaded to put themselues from under the Turks protection, untill they saw themselues sufficiently secured, both for the liberty of their Religion, and the keeping of their antient priviledges. And that they could not, nor would not endure a forreine Gouernour to rule ouer them, with whom they could not talke; nor yet suffer Clergy men to have any voyces in their civillat faires. And therefore (he faid) he thought it very necessarie that the Emperous should not doubt in this point to gratifie the Hungarians. And that Transyluania, whereupon hee had been hitherto inforced to bestow so great cost for the keeping thatens, being now lest vito Bolfcay, he should appoint such a Gouernous over Hungarie as the States of that country flould require. For that there was no hope of any peace to be made with the Tutks, except I Botfeay and the States of Hungarie should undertake the treaty thereof, seeing that they but only feeking for a peace in thew, were oftentimes diffcoursed but to feeke for their owne aduantages and profits.

But concerning Illishalehim himselse, the, Hungarian Rebels seeing him so much to labour or the Hungaria about the concluding of a peace, in scorne called him by the by name of Cripelishacim, as hee that too much inclined vnto the Germanes: which by name be tooke in foill part, as thathe departed fireight to Eperia, with a purpole not to have been prefere at the next affembly of the States but being again pacified, and by Bot scay called back, he made such a notable speech vinto the States in their next affembly, that all men now began both to hope and wish more for peace than they had before done.

In the meane time, the Turks in great number being gathered together to Belgrade, expected the end of this treaty for peace, and letters from the great Sultan to Benfey were intercepted also: whereby he aduited him to proceed in his purpose, and toyning with his powert, ro feizevpon Austria, Bohemia, and Morauja; for that he could not be contented with Hungary and Transylvania, and leave thereft of the Provinces onto Baffer as his inhe-

The Tartars about this time were about 10 make a road into Polonia 4 but when as they with their off incursions had not a little troubled the Haiduckes also in the vopes Hungary, they resolved amongst themselves to joyne their together, and to fight as well against the Turks as the Tartars, and from thenceforth neither to trust, the one nor the I

Hereupon, when as the Turks in great number came to affault Lippa; a towne of the Haidurkes, they forfaking the towne, fortified the Caffle with certains companies of amed men, and afterwards beltowed many others here and there in causes and cellers in the towne, and there are troved and my others here and there in causes and cellers in the towne, and finding the safes open, and none to refit them, balked to have taken the Caffle, but bet of them, and they the pouder which the Haidurkes had layed taking fine, blew as a number of them, and they which lay hid in the causes and cafflers forthwith breaking out, they of the middle they which lay hid in the causes and cafflers forthwith breaking out, they of the Turks a great flaughter, and againg clean the rownit.

The Efface of Authria confidering the great harmes they had in these late troubles seed ued, as well from the Hungarian Rebels, as from the Emperors mutinous fouldiers and by caperience raught how dangerous a thing it was for them to rest vpon other mens protection. A being vnto them strangers; resolued now in a general assembly of the Estates by them about this time holden, to take vpon themselues the desence of their Countrey against such sudden incursions and tumules of the mutinous soldiers, and no more to rely upon forrein protection, fill to feck when they had most need thereof. Wherefore to affure themselves in their own frength, they with a general confent agreed to have alwaies in readines two thousand horsemen and eight thousand footmen to be maintained at the common charge fifty of the country peafants stil finding of one of the said souldiers. And much about this time, viz. the third of June, Illishasciss a great man among the rebels, and yet the greatest furtherer of the peace, (as appeared by his doings, and by that wee haue before of him written) having before obtained letters of fafe conduct from the Archduke. R came now again with his wife also to Vienna; there more at large to conferre upon the Articles for a peace to be concluded, with such as were on the Emperors behalfe for that purpose deputed. Where comming to confer and talke about that matter, he was so crossed by Nicolas then Bishop of Vienna, who hitherto had been present in counsell together with the rest of the Commissioners (a great enemy unto the peace, in respect of the article concerning the liberty of the Reformed Religion) he was, I fay, by him so crossed, as that there was no hope of any thing to be for the common quiet concluded, so long as he was there present. For the which cause he, on both sides and of all men desirous of the peace disliked, was in the Archdukes name willed no more to come into the Councel, for disturbing of the peace. In which negotiation for concluding of the peace, Illishafeius had taken such pains in trauelling to and C fro betwixt the Archduke then lying at Vienna, and Bosseay with the States of Hungary then lying at Cassovia, and so debated the matter on both sides, that all things beeing as good as agreed vpon, for a full conclusion of all matters, he himselfe, together with George Humanoius, Francis Maget, Sebastian Tockel, Stanislaus Turson, and others, with two hundred horse, and thirty twowagons, in all four hundred persons, the seuenth of September came to Vienna, with fifty Huffars following them. Shortly after whose comming, the treaty for peace was earnefly begun, with often messengers passing to and fro betwixt Vienna and Cassovia, to Bessear lying then very dangeroully fick, until that all the articles of the peace were neere about the 14 day of September fully on both parts agreed upon: most difference arising about the Article for the free exercise of Religion. For although it was before declared, that men might have the D free exercise of Religion, yet the Hungarians recalling that general word Religion, to a particularitie, would needs have it fer down, that men might have the free exercise of those Religions which are at this day called the Lutheran, Calvinian, and Romith religion. Neither would they conclude any peace til they were of their request in that point satisfied. Which peace so concluded the next day after, the Deputies for the Hungarians sent an Embassador to the Visier Bassa at Buda, to certifichim of all their proceedings, and to request him not as Peace between yet to attempt any thing for the disturbing of the peace. Now the Articles of the peace the Emperour were as followeth.

ten ed Hanga .

Articles of Peace agreed vpon betwixt the Emperor and his discontented subjects in the vpper Hungary.

Hat from thenceforth it should be law full for every man thorowout the kingdome of Hunga-I ry to have the free wfe of his Religion, and to believe what he would.

2 That if the Hungarians fothought good, they might chaft a Palatine for their Governour; and that in the meantime the Archduke Matthias should no more veethe title of a Conernor, but of a Vice-

That the Crown of Hungary Sould still be left in the Emperors keeping.

That the Bishops that were nobly descended in Hungary, and had lands of their owne, should from R thenceforth be admitted into the Councell but the other Rishops not so to hereceised.

That Botscay for himselfe and his heirs mat should for ever hold Transylvania. That the same country of Transylvania should be still subject to the king dom of Hungary.

That for his arms he should bear three royall Crownes and three open Helmets.

& That

That he should no more afterward stile bimselfe Prince, but Lord of part of the Kingdome of G Hungary.

That they should pay the Haiducks their wages which had lenied them.

10 That the harms don on both sides should for ever be forgotten.

10 That Bohemia, Moravia, Lausnissum, and Austria, should not only with their Letters and scales confirm the articles, but also swear at Vienna to keep the same so far as should concern them.

12 That the Hungarians should likewise send some to Vienna, who in their behalfe should with their Letters, Seals and Oaths, confirm and ratific thele articles.

That the assembly of the States of Hungary should be referred untill a more convenient time for

14. That all these things being don, this agreement should be publiquely confirmed and involled in the H Records of the kingdom of Hungary.

15 That it should be lawfull for the Hungarians by their Embassadors to inuite the Princes of the Empire to the approving and confirming of thefe Articles.

Which fifteen articles were on the Emperors part subscribed by Trausam, Mollart, Sigisfied, Pruner, Lichtenstein, and Kreuberge: and on the Hungarians part, by Illistrascius, Peter Erkod, George Turso, Sigismund Forgat, and others.

The twentieth of September following, the Embassadors for Botseay and the Hungarians being admitted vnto the presence of the Archduke Matthias, obtained of him pardon for the forepassed rebellion, and all that was therein don. Vnto whom securitie for the same was as- 1 terward given by the provinces; therby also to affure them that they should not be therfore afterwards troubled. But yet for all that was before don, the title of the prince of Transylvania was left vnto Boistay for term of his life. Who feeling his sickness daily to increase, would oftentimes fay, That he could willingly die, fo that it would please God before his death to giue him leaue to excuse himselse of his rebellion before the whole Roman Empire. And so about the end of September, all the aforesaid Embassadours for the Hungarians and Bosses, being affembled into the castle of Vienna, together with the Emperors Councel, and certain other Noblemen of the prouinces belonging to the Emperor, received every one of them the articles of the peace, copied out and fair written in parchment. Which don they returned to their own dwellings:but Illishaseins went from thence to Newhuse, to bee present at the peace K to be afterwards made with the Turks also: from whence he afterwards writ letters unto the Visier Bassa, to request him, not as yet to attempt any thing against the Emperors provinces, but peaceably and quietly to expect his Commissioners, which were shortly to come to him.

But in the mean time whilst this peace was thus in concluding certain Tartare at Constan-Conflantinople, tinople, in their insolencie set fire vpon a certaine Iewes house : whereof arose such a terrible flame, as burnt not only many houses, but a great number of Iewes themselues also, the ham there don being efteemed at forty hundred thousand duckats. In which tumult and poiseof the people running to and fro and quenching of the fire, the great Sultan having a fall from his horse, was therof for a while sicke.

The Turks of Canifia also bauing conspired with the Captain of the lesser Comota, came I to have surprised the same. But the garrison souldiers there having before had a suspition of it, suffered so many of the Turkes as they knew they were able to ouercome, to enter and so shutting the gates of the city, kild them euery mothers son, the rest which were without retur-

Peace thus as is aforefaid concluded with the Hungarians, George Turfon, Nicolas Isluan, Iohn Mollart, Althem, with some others the Emperors Commissioners for a peace to bee, made with the Turks, went to Comara; Sigifrid Colleniez and Budin following them with the army: for as yet they durst not altogether trust the Turks, for intercepting them by the way. Which Commissioners caried with them Solyman Bassa of Buda, who had now bin seuen yeares kept prisoner in the castle of Vienna; and aly Bassa; both bravely apparelled in blew filk; iix wagons M following them, wherin were caried certaine prefents for the great Sultan, to wit, a most curious clock, certain fair pieces of plate, an hundred thoufand duckats, and divers other things A STATE OF A STATE OF

But whilst they there staid, expecting to hear from the Visier Bassathen at Buda, a sudden infolent accident fel out, like enough againe to have broken off the peace already made with the Hungarians, as also to have veterly cut off the treaty of peace to be had with the Turkes, and to have fer them altogether by the ears again. For albeit that the first article of the peace made with the Hungarians was, That cuery man should baue the free exercise of his religion; yet the eighth of O cober, about three a clock in the afternoon, when as a certaine Hungarian Lutheran preacher was in the pulpit preaching to the people in a church in the suburbes of Comora, Buchem and Knevie two captaines comming from dinner with certaine of their feruants more than halfe drunk, with their swords drawn ran into the church and draue the Preacher out thence; vpon whom captain Buchems trumpetter also discharged a pistol, and raised such a tumult in the church, that divers children were troden to death under foot, and the rest

Which infolent fact so mooued the Hungarians, that Turson and Budian there present with the rest of the Commissioners, ready to have gon about the treaty for peace, would needs the next day have departed from Comora, and were hardly by Mollart and Collonitz intreated to stay. Buchem and Knevie the two Captaines were bound to their appearance for answering of the matter, and the trumpeter with irons on his heels was clapt in prison. But the news hereof being carried to Neuhusel, and as the manner of report is, by same made far greater than it was, as, That 150 persons was slain in the Church, there arose such a tumult among the Hungarians there, as that Illishasciss with the rest of the captains had much adoe to quiet and ap-

Q peafe the same : who joining with the Turks of Strigonium and the Haiducks of the Island, had determined now by night to have invaded Comora, where the outrage was committed; had not Pogrania the elder (a man of great gravitie) comming from thence, declared to Illibascius and the rest of the captains all the matter as it was don; vpon whose relation the whole tumult was again appealed. But for almuch as the two aforelaid captains bound to their appearance, were by night fled to Vienna, the Hungarians were very ernest to have them severely punished, as breakers of the first article of the peace concerning Religion. Botscay in the Botscay causic mean time beheaded Catayus his Chancellor, who had gon about to poison him, in hope after bin Chancellor, his death to haue bin Prince of Transylvania himself splacing John Janusy in his stead, and gi-

Peace now made with the Hungarians as is aforefaid, and Commissioners appointed for a treaty of peace to be had with the Turks also (wherunto the Visier Bassa, then lying at Buda, was as forward as any, beeing so commaunded from the great Sultan his master) there wanted but a place commodious for the faid Commissioners, without suspition of danger, and indifferent for them all to meet in. Wherupon Cafar Gallen, a man of great experience in such matters, with some other captains, were appointed to find out a fit place for them to meet in:who having viewed many, at length made choice of one within half a league of Comora, fo fit for that purpose, as if Nature had thersore provided it. The great river of Danubius beeing there divided into three parts, made therin three Islands, al compassed round with the arms therof; into which Islands the Commissioners for the Emperor, for the Turk, and for the Hungarians might come without let one of another, to intreat of their affairs, and so in little boats prepared for that purpose, passe ouer one to another as their occasions required. Into which so commodious a place, the Deputies for the Emperour the 25 of October, conducted by the horsemen of Mansfels, Hohenlo and Bonehimin, came. After whom followed Illishascius and the other deputies for the Hungarians, affilted with the nobility of Hungary, alattending the comming of the great Sultans Commissioners, who likewise immediatly after came, being brought vp theriver in 24 brave thips wel appointed.

These Commissioners being thus apart arrived in the Islands, began first to consult by themselues euery one, of their seueral affairs and businesses; and afterwards many times meeting together, with much gravitie confulted and conferred of the best waies and meanes for the making of a good and affired peace for the appealing of these wars: which every one of them, and all together, to that end employing the vetermost of their indeauours, at last the nineteenth of Movember it was betwint all the three parties fully agreed upon and concluded, and hostages on all parts given one to another, with oathes and promises solemnly on all

And that the Turks should not exact their tribute by the point of their swords, but by the way of Iuflice, which they should commit with the diferetion of the ludges and Receivers, to that end appointed, that so it might be payed without oppressing of the people, except haply they which should pay it, upon prejumption Should deny it, or too long deferre the payment of it: inwhich case it should be lawfull both for the one side and the other, to wie such meanes as should seeme unto them good for the obtai-

These are the Articles of this peace, which God turne to the glory of his Name, and the B benefit of the Christian Commonweale; and for which all the townes of Hungary made great loy and triumph, which they declared by the thundring of their Cannons, which they in great number discharged, with many other solemnities and triumphs. The Commission ners themselues in token of their conceived joy, magnificently seasted one another also: which the Turks first began; and not content to have made them great cheere, gave voto out Commissioners great Presents also: for the Bassa of Buda gaue vnto Mollart, Althem, Turson, Istuan, Collonitz, Budian, Hendoc, Cafar Gallen, and Eleschin, braue and couragious horses most gallantly furnished; and to the rest exceeding rich garments and tapestrie hangings of great value. And as at the time of this feast, the troupe of Mansfield had by many fallies and vollies of, thot given great pleasure vnto the Turks as they sate at the table; Alla Baffa to dee clare the contentment and pleasure he had therein received, sent to the captaine of this troup two hundred duckets, which he would not accept, requesting in stead of them to have deliucred vnto him a certain captine by the Turks then kept prifoner; whom the Baffa caufed freely to be deliuered vnto him, and withall fent backe againe the two hundred duckets to be diuided among the fouldiers; which for all that Mansfeld refused, sending them backe againe unto the Bassa. After which actions of ioy and peace, cuery man returned home well content

These things thus done, and the peace confirmed, the Bassa of Buda forthwith sent his Embaffadors to Constantinople, certifying the great Sultan of the peace now made with the Christians: who thereof conceining greation, with a number of Ianizaries and others, in great D magnificence went to the Church, to give thanks therefore vnto his Prophet Makomet, and ipent the next day with great iport and pleasure, purposing from thenceforth to turne all his force and power for the suppressing of his Rebels in Asia, and the subduing of the Persian

Now albeit that there was a peace of late concluded with the illungarians at Vienna (as The Haidackes is before declared) yet divers ftirs, and tumults were neuerthelesse by the Haiduckes in divers to it innerer. places of the upper Hungary still raised : insomuch that about the end of November the Inhabitants of the County of Bocotsiewere through their infolonces inforced to joyne battell with them, wherein a number were on both fides flaine, and three countrey villages burnt: forthat it (bould seeme, no peace can be so well, and indifferently made, but that some will be fill troubling and impugning the lame.

Shortly after, viz, the thirteenth of December, Rosfeay calling together an affembly of the Bustay calling Estates of Lungary, propounded to them to by considered of, first, That the last revolt, al. an assembly of the state of mont generally made throughout all Hungaric in ith all the fines and troubles thereby rai. Hungary. fed, had all been hithereo to no other end made, but for the descrice of their Religion, and the maintenance of their antient liberty. Then, That whereas they by their generall good liking had made choice of him for their prince, and that hitherto he had done nothing without their knowledge and coplene 4 and than even now at this prefere he was by their confene ready to depart from the Caffles and free Ciries in the opper Hungary ; and had now fent his Letters vato the Archduke Matthias, for the fending of his Deputies, to receive them , whether hee should from thence forth relinquish the riple of a Brince of or mor. And that for a much as no wafte could bee made without great harme doing, that he would therefore for the avoiding of further troubles about fuch matters, that a Decige finul bemade, That all fuch wrongs and injuries (hould bee forgiven and forgotten, and that query man fhould still hold all such goods, whether they were moucable or immoueable, during the time of this latewarre. He G withed them also in the next generall assembly of the States, with all their power and endea. uor, to vige the repealing of the Article concerning the burning of Heretiques, with all other Articles contrary to their Religion: and not to remit any thing concerning the choice of their Palatine, as had in former time bin vsed : neither in this next generall affembly of the Estates to neglect any thing which might seeme to concerne their priviled ges and liberty. And that therefore they should be carefull to send thither wise and powerfull men, such as should not casily be ouercome with the clamors and outeries of the contrary part. At length he wished them to consider of this also, how a true and sincere consederation might bee made betwirt Hungary and Transyluania, so that a sase and quiet trassique and commerce might in both

These things thus done, Bosscar his sicknesse still more and more increasing you him, so at length prevailed, that it made an end of him, to the great forrow and griefe of all the people in generall, who had him in great honour and regard. He died at Cossouia the 30 of December, in the yeare 1606. He was honourably descended, and a man of great spirit, ambitious, wise, and politique, a great louer of his countrey, but an extreme enemy vnto the Germanes, and their government in Hungary,

A little before his death, he earnestly persuaded tohn I anusie his Chancellor to continue in his alleagance to the Emperor, and not to raise new stirres, or so much as in him was, not to suffer any to be raised. Neuerthelesse, such his wholesome counsell not regarded, there were fome who immediatly after his death were about to haue raised new forces, for to haue seised I vpon Transyluania, and so to have stirred vp new troubles. For preuenting whereof, Mathias the Archduke forthwith sent a messenger vnto the States of the upper Hungary; aduising them. That the great harmes and miseries considered which that part of Hungary had of late felt and endured, almost to the vtter ruine and destruction thereof (which proceeded not so much from the warres with the Turks, as from their owne civill tumults and feditions) they should from thenceforth give themselves to quietnesse and peace, and not again insolently to prescribe unto the Emperor what to do, or how he was to dispose of the countrey of Transyluania, affuring them, that the Emperour would not hereafter winke at fuch their rebellious plots and denices, but forthwith turne all his power and forces to the vtter destruction and rooting out of such rebellious and seditious persons, the disturbers of the common peace K and quiet. By which the Archdukes warning, some, otherwise ready enough to have raised new stirres and troubles, were not therein so sorward as otherwise haply they would have bin, but kept themselues quiet.

Now many there were (and yet are) which much maruelled, that the Christian Emperour would thus make peace with the great Sultan(as is aforefaid) he being then fo much troubled with wars, both against his owne Rebels, and the Persian King, in Asia, most part of his forces being turned that way; fo that a fitter time, or of more advantage, could not have been withed for the Emperor to have done great matters against him in, and not only to have holden his owne (which he did not) in Hungary, but to have recovered fome good part of his loffes there before receiued alfo. And indeed true it is, that the time then well served for both: L but what availeth opportunitie without power? And had the Hungarians (the greatest Arength the Emperor hath hitherto had for the defence of that little which is yet left of that so great a kingdome) been at quiet and at his command, and he himselse a Prince which had refled upon his owne strength and power; euer at his pleasure to have been raised, and as need should require supplied, without depending upon his friends and allyes, then haply it might haue bin in him accounted a great overfight, to have omitted and overflipped fo faire an opportunitie. But the Hungarians being then not only revolted from him, but taking part with the Turks, and the Turks with them, and he of himselfe with his own power not able to hold the field against them, or well to maintaine a defensive warre; and his friends and allyes his wonted and greatest states, then at his greatest need failing of him alfo, what should he in such M a case do but as he did ? to accept of a reasonable peace whilest he might have it; especially against such an enemy, as whose whole power being turned against him might have easily endangered his whole estate. For it is not reasonably to be thought, how the Emperour should

A of himselfe, without the great aid of the other Christian princes, his friends and allies, be able to with stand the huge and dreadfull power of the Othoman Emperour : as (without ominous orelage be it spoken) it is to be feared it will too true appeare, when soener his wars and troubles in the Balt being ended, he shall againe turne his forces this way towards the West.

Now Bos fear was no fooner dead, but that fome others of the Nobilitle both of Hungary 1607 and Transylvania (haply no leffe ambitious than was he) began by divers means to feek atter and to aspire to that principalitie!" Of whom, though some other with the weaknesse of their owne meanes or with the threads of Matthias the Archduke deterred, ceased further to fecke after it'; 'yet were there some others, who better supported, and nothing afraid of the Archidukes great words, labouted under hand to have obtained it. For the crofling of whom,

R and the avoiding of further troubles to be raised by these ambitious competitors, certain of the Nobilitie of Transylvania gathered together at Claudianople the twelfth of February. made choice of Sigifmund Regardie lor their Gonernor and their Prince of Transylvania, and the more roaffure him of their lotte and affection towards him, bound themselves vnto him By the oath of their alleagance folenihely taken in the chiefe Church there. And afterward fent messengers to the Afchiouse Maillian at Vienna, to certific him what they had done, and to excuse the infestions thereof who comming to Presburg the twelfth of March, there openly protested this election of higoshe for their Prince to have been made, not for that they were about to revert, or to rettoil from the Emperour, whom they would alwaics acknowledge fortheir Societeigne Lord ; but for that their nedeffitie fo required, many of the Nobili-C tie both of Transylvania and of Hungary gaping after this Principalitie, and going about, for the obtaining thereof, to raise new stirres and troubles. However, the same Ragos sie afterward dollbring not to be able without great trouble and danger, besides the Emperors displeasure, to hold the lathe Principalitie, of his own accord about a yeare after, gaue the same vp againe, and got him telfe out of the way to Sarentum : who was no fooner gone, but that Gabriel Bashot was about to have steet into his place : vnrownom the States of Transvluania fent word by two of the Noblemen, That the free election of the Prince belonged to them, and that therefore he mould not feeke by force to intrude himfelfe into the Principalitie, but quietly to come vitto the election, and not to bring with him about a thousand horsemen, and flux hundred foot:

About this time the firing towns of Neuhufe (otherwife called Neuheufel) the last yeare Neuhufe again so hardly won by the Hungarian Rebels, was againe deliucred to Sigefrid Collonitz for the Emperor, who thortly after comming to Vienna, brought news of a great number of the Turks to haue rifen up in rebellion at Belgrade, to haue rifled the town, and to haue burnt another town, called Atilchria, downe to the ground, and so with a great prey to be gone ouer to the Rebels: and alfo Redeisse, Bosfeay his Lieutenant, in going to take possession of certain lands given him by Boileay, to have been by his owne tenants, lying in wait for him vpon a streit passage,

Among & the articles of the peace before concluded betwixt the Emperour and the Great Sultan, one was for the mutuall fending of Presents one of them vnto another: With which E Presents, when as the Embassadour, by the Emperour appointed for the carriage of the same to Constantinople, from day to day deferred to set forward, the Turks and Tartars began to doubt, or else seemed to doubt of the good meaning of the Christians, for the observing of the aforesaid peace; and thereupon began againe not onely to roame abroad into the territoties of the Christians, but also caused the pledges left at Buda for the observing of the peace, to bee hardly handled and clapt fast in prison: whom when as the Bassa of Buda shortly after fuffered again a little to walke abroad, the proud Ianizaries were therewith so much offended, that rifing in a tumult, they had almost slaine the Bassa with stones, heaping upon him many The lanigaries reproachfull words, and vnto his face calling him traitor and betrayer of his Prince and coun- in mutious a trey, one of which pledges they grieuously wounded also. Which their insolencie the gainst obe saf-Bassa in some sort to chassise, and to deterre them from doing the like againe, caused certaine of them the night following to be fecretly taken, and being found, to bee so cast into the river of Danubius. And yet shortly after, they putposing to make a road vpon she Christians, to colour such harmes as they should therein doe, and to lay all the blame therof vpon the Christians, and to excuse themselves, they procured the Bassa to write G vnto the Archduke Matthias, of great wrongs done vnto the Turkes by the Christians, when as there was no such thing at all. The effect of which letters were, That whereas it was in the articles of peace set down and agreed, that both parties should abstain from roads and exists. cursions of each others countries, yet that the Christians for all that had aboue an hundred times fince the conclusion of the peace, made roads into diuers territories of the Turkes, and flaine many of them 3 especially them about Leovers and Sesschin, who (as they said) had flain divers Turkish merchants of Pesth and tooke from them greet sums of money, as they had also taken from them of Potsen an hundred and twenty horses, with digers other cattell.

Besides that, there were (as he said) sour. Types more twenty her had also neer yors. Capital and twenty eight more taken prisoners. And that is the mid way how its Harwan and Buda, H and twenty eight more taken pritoners. And that in the min way act with Harwan and Rud. five and twenty Turks more were flaine, and their portes; with all that they find beide caried away. Which things for that they tended to the breath of the peace he could port as he fail but advertic his Highnest of, for that both ought the high they exact he would not the hard see and to leftle by their exertions; as here one they had done, fo now likewife, to disturbe this good motte began, as here on the to increase their own privat profit. And that therefore feeing that he articles of the see and the second works are the articles of the second with the second will be a stricked by the second will be a stricked the second will be a second will be a stricked the second will be a second w part, wished not to attempt or goe about any thing contrary to the Articles of the percentage in like maner the Christians should also contains them follows within their owner bounds, and with all speed by Letters to give him to vader fland, whether they purposed to keep the page or not.

The great Sultan (as is a fore [aid) having made peace with the Christian Hyperous and now purposing to turne all his forces against his Rebels in Asia and the Persan American have oftentimes said) and desirous first to appease those his croubles at home, he for have further to-dowith the Perlian he fent a mellenger vnto the Baffa of Alepporo lay down am and to deliuer up his charge unto another, to whom hee had appointed the lame; promiting, that if he would thew himselfe obedient unto this his command, he would not onely pardon him all that was past, but receive him into his grace and savor allo. Whereunto the Balla and fwered, That he had never taken up arms against his Maiestee but tobe sevenged of the Bassa's of Tripolis and Damasco his sworne enemies; who once taken out of the way, bewould not only yeeld himselfe vnto his Majestie, but deliveralso the tribute sent him from Care g and Alexandria, by him before intercepted; and if hee to pleafed to imploy him, whing great forces in his service against the Persian King. With which apswer the Sultannot contented, shortly after sent the Visier Bassa with a great Army against the Rebels into Asia, Who by his wisedom and discretion, more than by force of arms, having appealed the rebels in the leffer Asia, and received certaine of the chiefest of them into his favor; withan Army of an hundred and thirty thousand men marched directly toward Aleppo in Syila, Of whole comming the Baffa having intelligence, with an army of forty thousand men, most of them harquebusiers, went against him, and in a place of advantage not past two miles from the city valiantly encountred him, and in three notable battels one after another withstood his whole forces. But making himselfe ready to have incountred him the fourth time, and we I derstanding of great aid comming to the Visier from the Bassa's of Damasco and Tripolis, he with speed retyred : and returning into the City, having trussed up his treasure, with such things as he made most reckoning of, fled into the mountains toward Persia with the greatest part of his army yet left stil following him. After which vnfortungt battel, the Visier Basta with his army comming vnto the city, at length by force tooke the fame, and there to the terrour of the inhabitants, put to the fword all the garrison souldiers which the Bassa had left there.

But the Bassa purposing with new forces to have encountred the Visier, finding himselse together with his better fortune, vtterly forfaken by many of his former friends and Compa, nions, thought it best at length to take his refuge vnto the mercy of the great Sultan. And M forefolued, by Letters requested the Visier Bassato write in his behalfe to the Sulran; and fo if it were possible to procure his peace. Which the Visier having easily obtained, hee was by Letters from the great Sultan sent for to Constantinople; with affired promile, that hee

A should be employed in service against the Persian King. Vison receipt of which letters, the Baffa with an hundred borfo fer forward; and comming to Constantinople, there in the presence of many other of the Bassaes humbled himselfeynto the Sultan swho not onely kept his promife with him in pardoning of him; but also in regard of the antient family whereof he was discended, as also of his great valour and faire conditions, received him againe inrobis favour, and caused all the goods taken from him in Syria, to be againe voto him reflored.

Now in the meane time the Great Sultan had by the meanes of the great Cham of Tarterie fought to make peace with the Perfian King; but all invaine; for that he demanded the City of Tauris, with all the provinces before eaken from him by the Persians, to be againe a vnto him reftored : which the Perfian King vtterly denied, for a fmuch as he had now by force of Armes recoursed the same, and which in former time belonged vnto his ancestours. At which time the faid Persian King, the more to entangle the Turke, writ vnto the King of Spaine, for the turning of his forces also against the Turke their common enemy; the Letters being to this effect: That though they were in Religion divided, yet that in power and in common hatred against the Otheman Empire they were conjoyned : and that hee considering the greatnesse of his power and armes, whereby beewas become his neighbour in the East, he could not but most entirely love and favour him and that therefore hee had commanded all his Provinces, as well in India as in other places thereabouts, that they should thew vinto his subjects all manner of courtesie, and to demand of them not ribute. And that he having by force racouered the fortresse of Aden, which Salyman the Turkish Sultan had fometime by treason surprised, he had appointed the same vnto the service of the Spanish Gouernour dwelling in Goa. And that his pleasure was, That all the Christians dwelling in his Kingdome (hould enjoy the same liberey and printledges which his owne faithful subjects had. And besides declared, that he had now for seven yeares space made continuals warres against the Turkish Sultan, who by treason had taken from him the strong Towne of Chiamon, for the reconery whereof he had now divers times overthrowne his Armies. But forasmuch as he was determined to make no end of this warre, vntill he had driven the Sultan out of those parts of the East, and recovered the seat of Ismael and Inchel, his ancestours in Babylon and Caire, he therefore requested him, being a King of so great power, to joyne D in league with him, and to fend his dreadfull fleet into the Perlian guife, promiting that by such meanes the Othoman power driven out, he could easily make himselfe Lord of Syria and of Ægypt. Last of all be reckoneth up the Presents he fent him; to wit, the Images of Ismael, luchel, and of Ionas, together with his owne, cast in gold, and set with most rich pretious stones and pearles; a Persian writing table, garnished with faire pretious stones, source dogs by nature wonderfully spotted with red, yellow, and blew spots, two peeces of Arras adorned with most pretious stones and pearle, wherein the worthy acts of him that great Tamberlane were lively to be scene: foure hunters hornes very smooth and richly garnished: twelve most gallant plumes of feathers of divers colours: fix drinking glaffes which could not be broken, and conchbeds to cunningly made, as that they were like vnto chaires, having wrought in them the antient wars betwint Afcanian and Chinfa King of the Medes.

Now the Emperour, for the better appealing of all former troubles, and the preventing of The States of new, and the better affurance of the State, had about the middest of August called an aftern human state of the States of Hungary to use bly of the States of Hungary to Presburg; whither they being come, and having long in vaine Presburg; by expelled the comming of Mathias the Archduke, by the Emperour appointed to have beene the perfuspion President in that assembly, were in the beginning of September about to have returned flop there faced home, but that requested by the Archduke to stay yet fifteen daies longer, they were contented to to do ; but yet voor condition; That if the Archduke then came not, they should not be bound to ftay any longer: For why, they by Letters certified of the attempts of the Tartars (who had requested to have a place in the borders of Hungary, appointed them to dwell F in) were destrous in any wife to have that assembly of Parliament put off to a surther time, that fo they might the better betime preuent and meet with fuch the Tartars designes, whom they were loth to have for their bad and troublesome neighbours. But the States of Hungary, beeing returned home from Presburg; and againe affembled, the foureteenth day of October, by their generall confent, decreed, That Tokay should againe be joyned vnto their jurisdiction and that the great ordnmes throughout L all the free cities should be removed and carried hopes vnto the places whereunto they before belonged a That the Vayuod of Transylvania should be admonished not to septrate Transylvania from Hungary: that the Bassa of Buda should be warned for to keep this Turks within their owne bounds: and that the Nobility of Hungary thould betime be admonished with all their force to represent Haiduckes, and all other their enemies. Howbeit the Haiduckes proceeding in their infolent outrages more than before, tooke certains forts, and with fire and sword spoyled many places of the Country; causing the people to sweare to be friends to them and the Turks, and enemies vinto the Germanes and Wallons: and demanding of Humanoisis the Crowne wherewith Bosfoar had forfetime beene revisided from he Grand Seigniour, had a purpofe to have crowned him, or some other for their M King : who for all that, by a meffenger fent word vnto them; that he would not at their hands accept that dignity, but faithfully continue in his allegiance toward the Emperous But

About the same time six hundred Haiducks going to the castle of Saint Andrew, and comming shither, could not be let in by the gattifon fouldiers, as they had defired, and perceiving them to make no reckening of their fernice, could no longer hold, but openly professed themselves to become the great Sultans servants who from thence marching to Budnoc. tooke it by force, and ranfacked it : and fo ftill feeking after booky, ran out towards Tockey, where by the way they were in a fireit by Hamansian, lying in wait for them, entrapped and sia bandred B almost all flaine; who afterward sent two of the Turks enfigures, taken from them, to Vien-Haldest in the property of the Turks enfigures, taken from them, to Vien-Haldest in the property of the Property na. and to the terrour of others; empailed some of them upon stakes, being brought prisoners Hamanina to Cassouia. For which unfortunat expedition, some other of the Haiduckes lighting upon two of the captains, who by chance had escaped out of Humanoine his hands, put them both to death for the cuill leading of their fellowes, hanging up the one, and with alicir fwords hewing the other all to peeces. Now by the report of some of the prisoners there taken, it was known this new rebellion of the Haidueks to baue bin raifed by the procurement of the Baffaes of Buda and Agria, who by their meffengers had promifed vnto them all helpe, Which report to have been true, the event did shortly after confirme, for the 27 day of Nonember almost 15000 of these Haiducks having before received from the great Sultan 200000 ducc kats for pay, came and most strongth ly besidged Filek, a strong castle, the Turks sending them great ordnance from Agriaganto whom these Haidueks had promised to deliuer all such places as they should win. Howbeit, the event of this siege answered not to their desire : for The mu Befuia; Captaine of Filek, with his garrifon all of Germane fouldiers, fo valiantly repulfed them, and the extremity of the Winter weather fo diffressed them, that they were glad to raise their siege, and be gone.

At the same time that the assembly of the States of Hungary should have been holden at Presburg (as is before declared) the Emperor had appointed also another affembly of the nobility and States of Austria to be holden at Vienna; where after they were affembled, certain articles were ento them on the Emperors behalfe propounded for them in that affembly then to confider of: as first, that for the keeping of the frontiers of Austria in quiet, the contribution on by them granted amongst themselves the last years, should this years following be doubled. Then, That if it should fortune the enemy to attempt any thing of new against that Pronince, that in flead of the horses and money which they were woont to send into the warres, they should for the space of twelve moneths, or of the greatest part thereof, as occafion should require, of their owne costs maintaineten companies of German footmen, euc-B ry company being three hundred firong; and as many troupes of Germane horsemen, ettery troupe confishing of an hundred horse. And, that if for the better defence of the borders of Austria there should happily need a greater strength, the same should be raised in no other forethanwas vied in Hungary, nor at greater charges maintained. And, that if it should continue peace, these charges should be converted to the payment of the souldiers wages: And that the States & other subjects of that Province should so much as might be, be cased from the trouble of fending either of horse or foot for the defence of the frontiers. Thirdly. There Commissioners should be maintained this yeare also to attend the atmy, and certaine skil. full Captaines appointed for the chusing of a fit Generall for the army. That diligent regard and care should be had for the provision of come and victuals for the vic of the people I ingenerall, as well in the time of peace as of warre. And that forasmuch as it much concerand the good of the Common-weale, to have the frontiers of the country toward Canifia diligently viewed, for feare of the Turks great garrison there still lying, that therefore certaine good and expert fouldiers, which knew those places well, should be chosen, who toge-Qqqqq * Whireft was egficitober sepon for that whilest they were yet intreating of peace, they had taken Strigonium and bridge concluded peace; they ceased not as yet with their counfeld and sidies helpe be Readwill their rebellious tumnits : which was manifefly to be perceived by the Haiducker thank selucs; who were not ashamed openly to profosse themselucs to be the great Sultans services; to require Cities and Fortreffes to be yeelded ento the Sultan, and so conspire against the very name of the Germanes. For the speedy remedy of which mischiefe, the Emperal had thought good, that confideration of this point should so beehad, as that the Punch should either consent unto a certaine standing and perpetuall contribution, whereby asian cient frength might alwaies bee ready, wherewith to with fland the enemies attempted M else that for certaine yeares twenty thousand footmeen and source thousand horse might there be ftill in readinesse, to be maintained at the common charges of the Empire, which the Emperour (need so requiring) might wie against the common enemys. Or shat if this were heavy or troublesome vnto the States of the Empire, yet at least they should consent yearely to contribute such money as might suffice for the sustaining of such a power, Another poynt of this conclusion, was about the correcting and reforming of the adminifiration of lustice in the Imperial Chamber. For seeing that in the former assemblies and meetings this matter could not be fully decided, by reason of certaine hinderances and impediments which then fell out, and that without the due administration and execution of lustice no Empire could long stand or flourish, no more than the World could without the Sunne; his Imperiall Majesty therefore would not have the deliberation of this so neceffary a point to be put off or referred vnto any other affembly, but to bee done and concluded in this present assembly. The third point to be considered of, was the warre which n hath beene now so many yeares made in the Low. Countries, and the inconvenience thereof redounding vnto the Empire. For whereas in the treaty of peace in the Low Countries. (at which treaty both hee and the whole Empire ought to have beene there prefent) for the better concluding and ending of the same, hee had heard the confederate Princes to be now acknowledged for a free State, he could not now any longer (as hee faid) forbeare, but that (seeing the Low-Countries to be a member and free of the Empire, and by the antient Records of the Empire, and of the Emperours, and by many other proofes it appeareth, the Gouernours of the Low-Countries to have beene vaffals of the Empire) he should by Letters which were written vnto the King of Spaine, the Archduke Alberiu, and the States of the confederate Provinces, admonish them. That they should not proceed to docor determine any thing in this matter, which might any way tend to the hurt or prejudice of the Emperour, of the Empire, and of the house of Austria. And forasmuch as that warre in the Low Countries had hitherto done no finall harme vnto the Empire, if happily it could not be agreed upon betweene the parties, and that it should happen the same warre to be any longer continued, or rather againe renewed, it should then bee considered upon, how the Empire might be satisfied for the great harme it had untill this present thereby received, and how it might be from the like harme hereafter kept and preserved. The sourth point in this consultation, which was to be considered of, concerned the coyne. For whereas it is manifest, that the value of the mony to bee dayly more and more inhaunsed and rayled, and that thereby not onely the Magistrates in the publique receipt, but the subjects also in generall received great and manifest harme, for asmuch as the price of such necessary things which wee must in this life have ordinary vse of, must of necessity be still more and more encreased, according to the value of the money, the Emperour thought good with mature deliberation to remedy this mischiese in this present assembly of the Empire. The fifth and last point which was to be considered upon, was the perfecting of the Matriculer of the Empire, for the giuing vnto euery man that which of due belongeth vnto him; the perfecting of which Matriculer, the Emperour would have in this affembly to be among it them confi-

Which articles thus propounded, there fell a great contouer sie among st the Deputies of the Princes concerning the manner of their proceedings in these matters : as whether they should consider of these articles in such order as they were propounded, or otherwise. And when as many thought it best first to consider of the article, for the reformation of Instice. being the fecond article propounded to be confidered of, and afterwards to come vnto the rest of the articles to be afterward consulted of: when as the two and twentieth day of Iaanary they came againe to Counfell, awriting was by the Emperours command read vnto them, whereby it was fignified unto the States of the Empire; the rebellious tumults by Botscay and some others raised in Hungary to be yet by the Haiduckes continued, the Sultan himselfe sending of them rewards, and furnishing them with ordnance and other things necessary for the warres, by the Gouernour of Agria, and the Bassa of Buda, threatening all extremities vnto them which should go about to refiss them; and then augmenting the danger which thereby might enfue vnto the Empire, and especially vnto the Germane name, see ing that it was manifest those rebellious Haiducks to have especially conspired the destru-Rion of the Germanes, and to have confirmed that their league, by drinking of an health: It was requested, that leaving off these contentions, for the manner of their proceeding, they

The Deputies

But when as in their often meetings, nothing could be concluded, by reason of the divers and different opinions betwixt the Protestants and Catholickes, Ferdinand the Archduke of the Empire, and unicited opinions between the Deputies of the Electors, of the Princes, and of the Imperialleiat Ratiobast, at ties, caused it by Letters to be declared vnto them, How that the Emperour not without ties, caused it by Letters to be decirated vision and the street of the not yet come to consult of the articles propounded in that affembly, to be by them considered of, but to his great griefe to be from day to day protraced: and that therefore he reque, fled them, That either they themselves would quietly end those diffentions among stehem. H felues, or else send their differences conceived in writing vnto the Emperour to be decided, and so to come at length effectually to consult of the propounded articles. And indeed the Deputies aforefaid had in writing before exhibited their mindes concerning that point, for the manner of their proceeding, vnto the Archduke Ferdinand. But forasmuch as that writing was according to the manner of the Catholickes and the Protestants, of two different forts; the former thinking it meet to confult of the aforesaid article in such order as they were propounded; and first of all, to confider of the contribution to be given against the Turks, and other enemies in Hungary; but the other labouring, first for the reformation of Inflice, and the confirmation of the peace of Religion: and afterward to provide for aidagainst the sorreine enemies, that so remedy might first be provided for inward, then forout. I ward griefes; especially seeing that they had no expresse commandement first to determine of the contribution. Vnto whom the Archduke by writing againe answered, That he had received no other instruction from the Emperour, than that he should consult of the aforefaid articles, with the Deputies there present, in such order as they were propounded: Neither that it was convenient, that the first article concerning contribution being negleded, they should proceed vnto the second, seeing that the enemies might easily, by the delay of putting off the same in effect, take occasion in the meane time to do the Christians great harme. Besides that, that he had sufficiently protested, That consultation concerning the reformation of Iustice should in this present assembly bee had also, neither that it was the Emperours minde to haue it deferred vnto any other affembly. Whereunto he exhorted the K Protestants, That they should forthwith endeauour by their Letters vnto the Electors and Princes, and other their superiours, to obtaine leave, that they might first determine some certainty about the first article concerning contribution; that so giving way to the opinion of the other party, they might instantly prepare themselves for the making of the contribution. Howbeit, this his persuasion prevailed nothing, by reason of their discord and diffention about the order of their confultation; the one part still labouring for the contribution to be first agreed upon, and the other part holding as hard for the reformation multige of Inflice. fo that Ferdinand the Archduke out of hope of concluding any thing that good and well hig was, not invaine to spend his cost and time any longer, the fifth of May dismissed the affect bly, and returned home, as did all the rest of the Electors and Princes Deputies, no one as L ticle that was propounded being so much as once reasoned of, but all left undecided 160 small care was there of the common good, either for the raising of money for the withstanding of the Turks and Rebels, or for the reformation of Iustice, the necessity of both, either on the one side or the other, so hardly vrged, and yet in conclusion be neither respected or regarded.

Whilest the Diet to no purpose (as is a foresaid) was by the Archduke Ferdinand holden archduke com at Ratisbone, Matthias the Archduke with a great traine following of him, came in the meane time to Presburg, where he was with much joy and triumph received; the garrifon fouldiers in order standing on both sides the way as he went vnto the Castle: Xaprarium the Bithop of Rab, with an eloquent Oration welcomming of him, in the presence of certains M of the Hungarian Nobility, who had gone out as far as: Hainburg to meet him; and now also honourably welcommed him, much rejoycing at his comming. The next day the Archbishop and Cardinall of Strigonium with a notable traine of Hungarian Gentlemen came to

Presburg: who forthwith received into the Castle, and having saluted the Archduke, conferred with him of many things in this affembly to be conferred of. In the meane time Illishasehins (that noble Hungarian of whom we have so often spoken) arrived there also with twelue coaches, ninety harquebusiers, and forty Hungarian horsemen going before him, and three hundred Haiducks which had attended vpon him, being at the gate difmiffed. So the chiefe of the Hungarian States being come, the confultation was begun the three and twentieth day of lanuary: where when as the Archduke had propounded vnto the Hungarian Nobility, what things they were especially to consider of; it was by them answered, The Haiducks before their comming out, to have determined, not one whit to depart from the articles the yeare before propounded and agreed of at Vienna; nor to admit any limitation B at all of them: fo that for the appealing of the tumults of the Haiduckes, there was no need of any new consultation, but onely to consirme such things as was then and there consulted and agreed upon. From which their resolution when as the Hungarians were not to be reinoued, and being grieued with the scotling at of certaine of the Clergy (thereupon refusing in any wife to make their appearance, as they were commanded, before the Cardinall in the caftle) were about againe to depart; making a folemne protestation, themselves to be guiltlesse of such harmes as should thereof afterwards ensue; it was at length on all parts agreed upon, That the whole matter should be committed unto ten chosen out of the Hungarian Counsel. commissioners lors, and ten moe of the Counsellors of Austria, to be consulted and determined of By whom specified for the night and twentieth of Lornary in the bound of the Appendix of th being met all together the eight and twentieth of Ianuary in the house of Illishaschius, it was of the new C concluded, That feeing that peace and quietnesse in those countries of Hungary and Austria troubles in could not otherwise be made, that those articles and conditions, concerning which no agreement could the yeare before be made in the treaty at Vienna, being quite left off and negle-Acd, the rest of the articles which were there agreed upon, should be still entirely observed and kept: and that it should be lawfull for every man to have the free exercise of his Religion. Which thing the Commissioners of Austria by a speciall writing there confirmed vito the Hungarians. Whereby they declared themselves after long and mature deliberation to haue perceited not onely by the true relation and report of the Hungarians, but also by their owne experience, vnto how great inconveniences the whole Kingdome of Hungary hath of long beene exposed, as well for the warres it hath had with the common enemy of the Chri-D stians, as for divers the civile tumults and seditions therein; and that therefore they not willing that fuch harmes should in those countries againe encrease and grow, to the infinite effusion of Christian bloud, after the articles of Pacification agreed vpon at Vienna, saw no other better remedy for these so great inconveniences, than that all parties should still hold themselues contented with the same articles of Pacification concluded and agreed vpon in the faid affembly at Vienna. And that therefore they had decreed, those articles to be fincerely and inviolately kept: and promifed vnto the States of Hungary, to give their aid for the defence of these articles, against all their enemies, being ready to gine good reason thereof before God, the Church, the Emperour Rodolph, the Archduke Matthias, and his other brethren, and all the House of Austria, as the necessity of those Countries should seeme to E require: hoping also that the States of Hungary would rest themselves likewise in that Pacification of Vienna, and the affurance thereof, in all points observing the same; and that they would alwaies give their ready helpe and aid vnto the Countries of Austria, against their enemies in like manner. All which things thus agreed upon and determined, Let. Little fear ters of Consederation were in the name of Antibias the Archduke, and of all as well the initial the Ecclesiasticall as Temporall States of Hungary and Austria, to this purpose written, That vales of Auwhereas for the appealing and suppressing of the tumults and seditions which the Haiducks first and Hunby the instigation of the Turks had of late not doubted to raile, for the concluding of peace minia ning of with the Great Sultan; they were met together at Presburg, and therein altogether busied, the article of to deuise how the Kingdome of Hungary, with the Countries adjoyning, might from de greed upon at struction be deliuered, the Christian Religion preserved, and from wasting and spoyling, Viena,

With these letters signed and sealed with the hand of the Archduke, and of the Noblemen there present, the first of February, Illishaschius with George Turson, were sent voto the tumultuous Haiducks (who had now appointed their messages to be sent vnto the Sultan and the Tartar Cham, to craue their aid) to diffuade them from such their purpose, and to persuade them to quietnesse; threatening them withall, That if they would not hearken to such honest conditions, they thould altogether, and at once, be fet vpon and oppressed by the whole power

The Assembly at Presburg thus ended, Mathias the Archduke returning to Vienna and forthwith calling together the States of Enserie, declared vnto them all that was done in the Assembly at Presburg. And for as much as that affembly was chiefely to that end appointed, That the Kingdome of Hungary should not altogether be pluckt away from the Empire, and that after the reuolt thereof, the greatest harme to be done by the incursions and spoyling of the enemies, would lie vpon the countries of Austria, he aduised them so to looke vnto themfelues, and carefully to prouinde for the Common weale, as that having mony alwaies in readinesse to maintaine an army, they might with all convenient speed go to meet with the Haiducks, if haply they would not conforme themselves vnto the Articles of Pacification, but againe raise new broiles; that so they might desend and preserve their Country from their I outrages.

The Prince of

About the begining of this Spring, when as Ierome Prince of Valachia was dead, leaving l'alachia diel's behind him a fonne but thirteene yeares old, the Emperour admitted him, as yet not capable whole pridow notably prefer. Of the gouernment, under Tutors, unto the succession of his heritage. Which thing the Valawith be coun- chians being by no meanes willing to endure, and bearing themselues vpon the helpe of the Turks, went about to make choice of another in stead of their Prince of late dead. For which cause, the Princesse widow by letters certified Polloscie hersonne in law, of this outrage and injury of her subjects; and having obtained of him a great summe of mony, and therewith raifed an army of ten thousand good souldiers, went forth against the Valachians, and in open field ouercame them in fobloudy and terrible a battell, that having flaine fire thousand of K the Valachians and Turks, she had ouer them a notable victory, and by that manes presented the principality of that country for her fon.

The Great Duke of Florence had hitherto done great harme with his fleet vino the Tuks in the Mediterranean sea: for which cause a messenger about this time comming vnto him in the Great Sultans name, promised him great matters, if he would from thenceforth forbeare to hurt and pursue the Turks Gallies. Which his request served the Turks to no Turks to fpare other purpose, but as it were to put oyle vnto the fire. For the Duke afterward caused new Gallies to be made, and his fleet encreased, and therewith did more harme than formerly he had done.

Now although that after the ending of the Assembly at Presburg, Illishaschins and Giber L refuse to admit Turson had delivered vnto the Haiduckes the Articles of the Pacification, and commanded of the Patifica them from thenceforth to keepe themselves quiet; yet for all that, could they not yet be p. rsuaded to hearken vnto such their counsell : for that they being men fill accustomed to the wars, and living by their swords, could not endure to fall to Husbandry, and such other labours. For which cause they of the country about Gymeric, writ vato them which dwelt in the country about Nufol, letters to this effect : That for a much as they being divers times certified of the miserable estate of their neighbours, had refused to come to sid them, they should yet now remember how necessary a thing it were, with their conjoysted minds and forces to helpe one another; for that the Haiduckes having now passed the river of Telle were broken into that Province, and were run as far as Budnoc: neither were they minded fo M to flay, but to rob and spoile all the country before them, if they were not with speed encountry tered. And the rather, for that but a few daies before, they had received thirty thouland Hungarian Duckats from the Turks, whom they now acknowledged for their Lords, with horses and other gifes to be divided among their leaders and captaines; and moreover; dayly expedied all from the Tartars, who in great humber lay about Belgrade. Wherefore feeing would not be expressed, what great harme and loffe was by the Haidnicks done, as well vito the Noblemen themselves as to the common country men; that they should therefore there epsilous trades to the company to wilder transf. and water liped to take vp arms against the same by Norlong ared; in burtle latered of March Proclamation was made by the commandement of Matthias the Archduke, throughout all Austria, That curry man should prouide ment of Antima the Archives, throughout all Authra, I hat curry man mould proude himself en alle the partie dank whereof hims diverly suspected; flow beit that vinto this Proudent and the reading of the tribulation of the reading gariadi, se A and and I widucks; for the warte was to take in fland. There were also Lecgarden Avenduke hame somewhoo the Vanteloff Auffris, to give them to underliant, That whereas their west not ignorant what for he obtaining of peace, and defence of these comgies, had of this beenedecreed at Pleaburg; and that all the States of Enferie had approve and the report share of received from their Departes, and fo promited their helpe and aid virto the Archidices if that he himselfe would take in hand any expediction, they would joyne them Class which him, and together with him to flue or die : yer that there were fome, which being niere de frous of war than peased id not only not reft vpon the former pacification, but gathered an army allows the borders of Moraula, with a purpose to make an inroad as well into Moraula, as into Austria it feffe. Por which canfe the States of Moraula were also enforced for defence of themselves to raise an army, and to crave helpe from their neighbors. And that therefore seeing the Archduke, mindefulf of his promise for the common describe of the country, was refolued to befrow his life and all his fortunes, and in his owne perfor to undertake an expedition into those places from whence the greatest danger was to be leated to fall vponthole countries; necessity then required, that the States themselses also should suffer nothing to be wanting on their behalfe, but enel y one of them together with their fernants forthwith to Joyne the hieles the Architike, and to the vitermost of their power to endeaubr themicires to deliver their and theirs from death and defirection. That God, in whose thame this expedition was by them to be taken in hand, as by the louers of peace, might D fo in horedine make an end of all tumules, and grant vnto those countries withed peace and quietnesse. And that therefore they were to be admonished. That according to the tenor of the Deerte made at Presburg, they with flich a number of horfe and foot as they could vpon the fudden raife at a day to be thortly afrettito them named, should joyne themselves vnto the Archduke, and nor to fuffer any thing to let them in fo doing. So that If hapty any chance or fickeneffe should happen voto effeir Generall, yet nowithflatiding that they should fend their power under the leading of some other man, seeing that the Archduke himselfe spared not to aduentute his life and fortilities, and (If God Hould fee it fo good) account it a great gaine euen to lose the same, so that thereby he hight do his country good. About the beginning of Aprill, the Cardinal returning from Prague to Vienna, brought The Archdule with him the Emperors answer and refolution with him the Emperors and the Emperors and refolution with him the Emperors and refolution with him the Emperors and ref that were done and concluded with the Hungarians and Tutks; bur that his will was, That for his expedition confederation confede the confederation made betwirt the States of Hungary and Austria at Presburg, should be tien into otewoid and of none effect. Which the Archduke protesting that he could by no means like of, or fuffer to be don, he the 15 of Aprillafterwards with a great number of the Peers, Nobility, and Counsellors, and a multitude of good souldiers, going out of Vienna towards the monaflery of Neoburg, fee forward vportals journy; carrying with him eight and twenty pieces of ordnance, there expecting his fouldiers in all places leuied by publike Letters protesting That no man should from his arms redefide any harme; or if that by chance any harme were done unto any man by this army, affiliting his lubjects it frould be againe unto them reflored and recombenfed.

But the rumor of this expedition being brought into Boliemia, the Nobility of the court try began to affemble themselves the fifteened day of Aprill; whither when as many of the

Deputies of the other Countries were affembled also, it being decreed, That the Nobility

But Matthia the Archduke in the meanetime meaning forward with an army of works. Manthia with thousand horse and source and twentierh day of Aprill came to Aname, acity of Mountain with thousand horse and source and twentierh day of Aprill came to Aname, acity of Mountain with thousand horse and source and twentierh day of Aprill came to Aname, acity of Mountain with thousand horse and source and twentierh day of Aprill came to Aname, acity of Mountain with the source and twentierh day of Aprill came to Aname, acity of Mountain with the source and twentierh day of Aprill came to Aname, acity of the source and twentierh day of the source and the source and twentierh day of the source and the source an and army come ravia, and was there by the States of Morania (who the day before were come thicherally u with foure hundred horic) honourably received and brought into the City From these fending out letters into the territories of Bohamia, and to the city of Prague, be requeled That they would fend out of every place two deputies for them, water the affembly to be bol den at Zallania, the fourth day of May; promiting withall, That, hee him felle there being prefent, would yeeld anto their deputies a reason of bis doings, as allowhat he meant to do hereafter. Befides that,he by letters fent unto the Electors and other Princes of the Brapire. declared the cause why he was enforced to make this expedition; and withall sending vano them a copy of the agreement made at Vionna, the fine and swentieth day of Aprill, in the yeare 1606, by the common confent of the Archdukes; in most friendly manner requested them. That they would not intermeddle in this businesse, bus rather with their counsell and I aid to further the fame.

But the three and twentieth day of Aprillithe Emperor feat the Popes Embassadors, with the Embassadors of divers other Princes and States, then lying at Prague with fundry of the Bohemian Ministers, in Embassage to the Archduke Mathias, still lying at Zname, whom the Cardinal the next day after followed alfo, to make fome good pacification, if it were possible, with the Archduke. But the Emperor in the meane time calling vnto him the counsellors of the old and new towne of Prague (contrary to his wonted manner) most courteously with his owne hand received them, and giving them thanks for the faithfull duties by them hitherto performed , requested them. That hereafter they would continue in their like fidelity and loyalty alfo:most liberally promising vnto them all kindnesse, with the restitution of the priuiledges concerning the shutting of the gates of the city which liberty they had before lost in the time of the Emperor Ferdinand. And not long after, a generall muster was taken not only in the city of Prague, and the townes thereabouts, but also throughout all the Kingdome of Bohemia, and three hundred muskeriers appointed for the gard and keeping of the cafile, under the command of Count Solmes, who had commission for the raising of other fouldiers alfo.

The Tarter Chamdieth.

At the very fame time it was from Constantinople certainely reported, the Tartar Cham to have died, and the Turkish Sultan having received newes thereof, to have dismissed his fonne, whom he hitherto had detained as a pledge, and with divers thips and gallies, to have caused him to be transported over the Blacke Sea, vato the borders of Tartary, there to take L possession of his fathers kingdome. It was also then reported, certaine of the seditious Turks making of a road, to have furprifed Smirna, a rich city of Asia, and to have forraged all the country about it farre and necre, and comming vano Magnefia, a chiefe city of that Country, to have had ten thousand crownes by the inhabitants offered, from thenceforth to spare the Country thereabouts. The Persian King also at the same time notably to proceed in his warres, and to do the Turks great harme, the Turks and Tartars feeking in vaine to with fland

In the meane time Embassadours comming vato Prague from the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, part of them the pinth of May, went nato the Archduke Manhie to Zaslauia, who still lay there encamped with an army of fine and ewenty thousand ment of M whom they requested a truce for the space of eight daies, for the making of a Pacification betwixt the Emperour and him, and for friendly ending of this bufineffe, eafily obtained the fame, especially seeing that those Princes Electors, being joyned and bound vnto the Empe,

A rose in a double confederation, is well for their Electorship, as in respect of the Kingdome of Bobenia, could cot, as they faid, otherwife do, but fent present aid unto the Emperor his neceffey to requising to which and they had now in readineffe certaine thousands of fouldiers in the frontings of their comparies, to be forthwith fent unto him : The other part of thefe Emballadors in the meane time staying with the Emperor, where after the German manner they were all prouided of good cheere and wine.

About the leuenteenth of May Matthias the Archduke with eighteen thousand men rose Muthiastic and marched towards Prague, Collonit with the reft of his army following him. And al-cheb towards though that the Archduke had feverely commanded his fouldiers to abstaine from robbing, Prague. spayling and, burning of the Country, and had divers times severely punished some offenders therein, hip hanging of fone, and heading of others, yet could be by no meanes for eftraine them, and keeps them in but that fome of them would fometimes be stragling abroad, and doing harme, alpheially the blungarians, who were ftill running out even as far as the Empesors campe, and the new view of Prague, Whom for all that, the Emperours fouldiers (being then twenty, thou (and fireig) would not medale with all, being focommanded by the Empecourse Homodichimosafthale stragless going too faire abroad into the country, were by the of The shiele and buencieth day of May an affembly of the States of Bohemia was called at Passac, the Empercushinate liebeing there present; Adam Waldsteine carrying the drawne findish before hadis. In which affembly the Nobility and States of the country with one confear promised to spend their goods and lives in the Emperous quarrell; yet in the meane tials requested the se things following to be granted and confirmed unto them : viz. That Religion according to the confession of Bohemia and Augusta should inviolately be kept, and that they which professed the one, should not therefore scoffe or despile the other. That Bobeznians only fliotild be preferred to Archbishopricks, Abbotships, and other spirituall prefeaments: That the Archoishop should not meddle with civill and political lassaires. That Ecclesiastical offices should be permitted unto the Protestant Ministers, as in sormer time, the Catholichian shemean eime holding what they had. That the Pontificall dispensation in mauson of Matrimony, according to the Decree of the assembly holden in the yeare 1602, fliculd be abangated and taken away. That it should not be lawfull for Priests and other Ec-

D classaftical personautoday lands on territories, without the expresse consent of all the three States, but do bold theinfelues contented with their tythes and other their revenues. That it should be tarfaill ideals trees in their own ground and territories to build Churches for Religios, on book fides. I Historeflants and Patrons of the University of Prague should be joyacid to the Confidory, without were in the time of the Emperor Ferdinand. That one should be chosen for Burgeaue in this assembly. That chiese politicall offices should not be left void aboue a month. That when the se political loffices men of both religions should be admitted : forthar if the Borgrave were a Catholike, the chiefe judge should be a Protestant. That every man should enjoy his right, and that no Decree should be published against the same: neither that they which were of the Order of Knights should be rashly sued, or bound to any arrest.

That one of the Bohemians should alwaies be chosen into the secret Counsell, and made acquainted with the Bohemian affaires. That every man might have accesse vnto the Emperor, and not all things to bedone by his Counsellors. That it should be declared to all men, what was to be understood by the crime of treason. That a difference should be made betwixt offences: and that no man should for any light offence, together with his goods, tose his life and reputation. That the fuits of widows, orphans, and others also, should with expedition be dispatched, and not from day to day deferred. That from henceforth the father should not be bound to pay the fons debt, which he was run into without his knowledge; neither yet the fon himselse. That in political lossices men should not be too much grieved with too heavy exactions. That men fued should not be summoned but in good tearms, and that such as were in any reputation be bound to any arrest, without the hearing of their cause, and much lesse to be imprisoned. That the sword vpon frowardnesse or madnesse taken out of the Church of Thine certaine yeres before, should be againe set in the former place. That Lawyers which pleaded mens causes, should be contented with such fees as were by common Decres appointed them.

And last of all to conclude, they in any wife requested the Emperous, that it would plate G him to case the Nobility and States of Bohemis of these grintes before they were compated to answer vato such things as were to be propounded wato them on his behalfe, Who dilly granted vnto most of these articles, those which concerned Religion only the pred, so the the Senators of the old towne of Prague obtained the defited is word to be again forthwick fer in the wonted place. But as for the businesse of Religion, is was altogether put off and deferred vnto the next affembly to be holden at the feath of Saint Michiel.

About the end of May the Archduke Matthias bis Embassadors having receited safeton duct from the Emperor and the Nobility of the kingdome of Bohemia, came so Prague and being admitted into the councell of the Nobiling, Charles Count Terminate whom the charge was given, having in the Archdukes name first saluted the Nobility anded whethe H and the reft had in charge, to be before them out of a long writing in the Boltemian tonger read : which done, when as, the Nobility to requiring, they were put afide, and almost a houre after were called againe, they received answer, That the points of the Embaffagety them propounded, were greater and of more weight than that fufficient deliberation could thereof in fo short a time be had ; and that therefore it was by the Nability thought meet that Commissioners on both sides meeting together in the open field peers vato Debrite should there consult of these articles, and by the consent of the Burberos and Archdike todo what they might to end the matter. Vnto which answer the Archdelies Embassidois confed ting, the ninth of Iune returned againe vnto the campe. The Emporture Embeliadors within two daies after with forty coaches and an hundred horse following them vnto the places 1 pointed; who oftentimes going to and fro; at length fo wrought the matter on both fides, that the bulinesse quietly and friendly ended they were againe made friends.

The articles of which pacification and agreement betwirt the Emperor and the Archdoke were the seuenteenth day of lune in the castle of Prague openly read in the Bohemian tonate. Liehtenstein, Kintskie, and other Chiefetaines the Archdukes Embaffadeure, being there prefent, in order thus:

That the Emperour refused not, but that the Crowne of Hungary should be delinhed pas featierbe into the Archduke Matthias his hands : and to yeeld vato him the Kingdome of Hungary, with the man and to remit vnto his fubjects the oath of their allegiance before given vnto him, to this the Arthdate Mail Nobility and States of Hungary should chuse no other King but the Archduker That in the R next Dyet of the Empire, he should propound vnto the States of the Empire to be challed red of, what contribution they ought to make vnto the Archduke for the defence of their frontiers, if happely longer warre were to be made with the Turke. That hee flivald case the Writings which concerned that Kingdome of Hungary, within the space of two mostles to be delivered vnto the Archduke. That he should likewise also surrenderapahe Arch dukedome of Austria, by himselfe hitherto possessed, vato the Archduke yet in as that the Archduke should take vpon himselse all the Emperours debt as well in Hungary as in Anfiria, and within a yeare should cause sufficient Recognizance or Caution scaled withhis owne hand, to be deliucted vnto the Creditors. That he should cause all the Letters and Wife tings, as well concerning the upper Austria, as the neather, within the same time to be deline. I red vnto him, together with a Copy of the Priviledges therein, vntill that deliberation might be had concerning them, to be transferred into him alfo. That the Nobility and States of Bohemia should in the Emperours name ratisfie and confirme the Treaty held at Vienna, for the making of the peace betwirt the Emperour, the Turks, and the Hungarians. That they alfo should not refuse at the Emperours request, to promise vnto the Archduke a ceruise fuccession into the Kingdome of Bohemia, but yet with condition, so that if is should happen the Emperour to die without heires male, before the death of the Archduke his brother : but if he should have heires male lawfully begotten and vider age : that in that case he should onely have the rule and government of the Kingdome of Bohemia, yet with cartaine Bohemian Counsellors joyned vnto him. That the Archduke should by Writingcon M firme vnto the Nobility and States of Bohemia, That he should after the vsuall manner and fashion demand the Kingdome of Bohemia, being void of a King. That he should take the viuall oath of a King, and alwaies haue like regard of all their priviledges, as the other Kings

A his predecessours had. That the States of Bohemia should not gainesay, but that the Archduke might hereafter vie the title of the defigned King of Hungary. That the administration of the Marquifet of Morauia should be granted vnto the Archduke Mathias and his heires, together with the title of a Marqueffe, till that after the death of the Emperor this Prouince was againe to reuert vnto him which was to enjoy the kingdome of Bohemia. But if it should happen the Archduke to die before the Emperour, the States of Bohemia should not refuse, but that this Prouince separate apart, might (as should feem good) chuse vnto it self a Patron and Desendor, vnto the death of the Emperour. That the Bishopricke of Almits, hitherto in temporalities subject to the King of Bohemia, should from thenceforth acknowledge the Archduke Matthias to be the Gouernour thereof, left there should be a confusion of suites in B Morauia, the Bishop in the meane time having regard to his owne priviledges. That the Emperor at the request of the Archduke should maintain the priviledges of them of Silesia, and of the States of the cities, and augment them also with new priviledges, being reasonable and convenient. That for the defence of the borders against the Turks, the Nobility and States of Bohemia (hould not contribute more than hitherto they were wont; yet fauing to the Archduke power and abilitie in the generall meetings and affemblies of the Kingdome to intreat thereof, as the Emperor had hithorto had. That the titles of all the Prouinces which the Emperor did now furrender ynto the Archduke Matthia, should be still unto him reserved. That the Archduke Mathias should veterly renounce the County of Tirali, and surrender his part therof vnto the Emperor. That in the meetings and affemblies to come, the Archduke should C by all means endeauour, that the Emperour should receive a reasonable yearely contribution out of those Prouinces which he now departed with. That all offences hitherro committed, should generally be forgiuen and pardoned, all and enery the persons on both parties, onely Verkanious excepted, concerning whom, as also concerning his debt, the Nobility of Moravia had undertaken in their next Assembly to take order. And that armes should onborh sides be laid apart.

Which pacification thus made, many our of the Archdukes camp, but especially the Hungarians, went into the City of Prague, there to buy things necessary, and many came also our of the City to see the Archdukes camp, But in the mean time carrains infolent foldiers having by night broken spectraine shops of the lewes, and carried dut of them much rich wates, were the cause of great stirres and tumults in the City; infomuch, that divers of the fouldiers were therefore cast into prison. The first of July King Mathin vising with his army, departed from before Prague, taking his way with his chiefe Councelfors rowards Dintre and distiding his avery into shice parts, that fo they might the more cassiler passe through those countries home. After the riling of which army, a certaine noble Bohemian andia good foundier, called Contouts, vinto whom the Hungarians and Haiduckes had in this expedition done great harme, with fix hundred harquebusiters and a number of countreyment went forth to a place called Patrovitle; where having cut off the passage, and cut downe trees erosse that water, that some might thatway conveniently passe, hee with such bury in a place of advantage charged the Hungarians, comming that way, that having thaine above nine hundida of them, force others were also carried away prisoners, with a great booty of horses, waggons; and other goods. With which deed the Hungarians grieued, rod downe the corne as they went; and began to fet five on the villages and houses in the Country thereabouts. But the newes thereof being brought vato the King, hee forthwith by Heromitan, Generall of the horfement commanded the Hungarians and Haiducks not onely to defift from this their infolencie, but themselues also, upon a great penalty, to help to quench the fires by them raised, In the mean time the comming of King. Mathias being reported at Vienna, great prepare tion was there made for receiving of him, and bringing of him into the city according to his King Matthian royal dignitie: who the 14 of July towards night beging come thither, with the Archdyle Maximilian his brother, and 3000 horse, the Archbishop of Hungary, who with Count Trans famius and many other of the Emperors counsellors and fernants went out of the city tomest him, and there amid it eight enfigues of German foldiers, and 1 500 hor femen, at it were fet in order of battel, received him with a long and eloquent oration; as did afterward Transfaming, in the name of the States of Austria; the Emperors Counsellors also honorably welcomming him. Which done, mounting again to horse, the King with the Archduke Maximilian his bro. ther, stayed until two troups of the horsmen of Vienna, in number about 400, were all entered H into the city; and afterwards 1.500 of Bucheims horfemen and the aforefaid eight enfignerof the Germans going before, and the Emperouts Counfellors following them, the King him. felfe with the Archduke his brother and all his train fet forward, and paffing ouer the bridge, wheron three triumphal arches were most sumptuously erected, he was by 3000 Citisons of Vienna, gallantly apparelled and armed, with much thundring of the great ordnance & vollies of small shot most magnificently received, divers other triumphs and sports, to manifest the joy of the people, heing there made also, which for breuities sake we passe ouer. But being gon a little further, he was by the Senators of Vienna on horseback received under a rich caropy, born vp by fix of the antientest of the faid Senators, and fo brought to Saint Stephens Church; whither he was no fooner come, but that lighting from his horse, he was there received by the whole Clergy, and vadet a canopic brought into the Church; where after Seruice don, he was with like triumph and magnificence, through divers other triumphall arches, brought to the Caffic, the great ordnance on all fides still thundring off from thence, and from the walls and bulwarks of the town.

Trouble in Au-Aria about re

But these triumphs and solemnities ended, shortly afterwhen as they began to consult a. bout such things as concerned the good government of the kingdome of Hungary and crowning of the King, and that the Protestant States of Austria in many places began to exercise their Religion according to the manner of the Confession of Augusta; and that the Ministers began openly to preach in the Churches there, Leopold the Archduke and Bishop of Passavia comming to Vienna, with Melinusche Popes Nuntio (but a little before comeso Prague) g with Cardinal Forgatium and the Bithop of Vienna, with carnell and importunate foliciting of the King, obtained from him a commandement. That that exercise of religion should be again absogated, the Chutches thut, and publique preaching forbidden, Which thing forthwith brought forth new thirs and troubles in Austria. For the Protestant States forthwith calling a Councelamong themselves, by generall consent refused by nath of loyaltie and ale legiance to binde them folues with the new King, virill they had of him obtained the libertin for the free exercise of their religion; and combining themselves together, resolved even with the loffe of their lives and goods to maintain the free preaching of the Word, and exercife of their Religion according to the Confession of Augusta; and to that end commended all their subjects and tenants to be ready in arms that need to requiring, cutty things then, tenth, or fifth might be preft to come forth unto the wars . In the mean time letters were brought from Confiantinople to Vienna; declaring King Matthias his Embafladors having audience with the great Sultan, to have in an eloquent Oration on the Kings behalfe promifed, religiously to keep the peace of late made bosweene them. And afterwards in the Kings name to have offered his prefents vnto the Sultan, and he in the presence of his chiefe Bassa's to have received them. But when he came to request the government of Transylvania, he would in no wise therunto consent, but gave the same to Gabriel Bather with commandment vnto the Baffa of Buda for the establishing of him in this

About the beginning of October, the Counties of Trautsame and Furtsenburg were from King Matthias fent vnto the Protestant States at Horne; and shortly after them Maximilian the Archduke followed alfo. Who although they with most glorious promises sought to appeale them, and by all means to draw them to take the oath of allegiance; yet could they no whit prenail with them, without granting the free exercise of their Religion. But the fixt of October, the Catholique States not expecting the confent of the Protestant States, at Vienna swore fealty vnto Muthia the new king of Hungary; the great ordnance in the mean time thundring off, with drums and trumpets in every place of the City founding, and the rest of

King Matthias having thus at Vienna received the oath of allegiance of the Catholiques, shortly after departing thence, the 12 of Odober comming to Presburg, was there by the nobility of Hungary received and brought into the city with 10000 foldiers. Which Estates afterward, viz. the 6 of Nouember, offered in writing vnto the King certaine articles, whereof they defired to be by him affored: most of which articles were drawne out of the pacification made at Vienna the 23 of August, Anno 1606, the chiefe effect wherof was this. That the free exercife of Religion (hould be permitted vnto all men in all the cities and towns of Hungary, not so much as that city to be excepted wherein the king should be resident. That no German captain should be suffered in any the strong forts of Hungary, but that the strong townes of Rab, Comora, Vivaria, and others, should be committed vnto the government of naturall Hungarians born: That the crown of Hungary should still be kept in Hungary and committed to the keeping of Temporall men. That first and before all other things a Count Palatine should be chosen. That the king himself should alwaies reside in Hungaric or if not that the D Palatine in his absence should have ful power, with the Counsellors of estate of Hungary, to determine and conclude of all things, and that the King should therewith hold himselfe contented. That no publique office should be bestowed vpon any, but vpon such natural Hungarians as had of their country wel descrued; nor permitted to any for mony. That no lesuites should be suffered in the kingdom neither that Ecclesiastical men should be so much favoured as formerly they had bin. That officers should not be bound to give account of the admi. nistration of their offices, but before the Treasurers of Presburg, being natural Hungarians born. That from henceforth mony should not be carried out of the kingdom, as hitherto it had bin. That the Palatine being dead, the king should within a year keep another; the chiefe Iustice in the mean time after the old maner supplying his room,

The Protestant States of Austria had but a little before sent their Embassadors vnto the Transles in Nobilitie and States of Hungary then gathered together at Presburg; with request, That for- Austria about almuch as they could not by any intreaty obtaine of the king the free exercise of their religion, as wel within their cities as without, and that very necessitie had driven them by force of arms to feek for the fame, that they would by fending of them men, afford them fuch avd as was vnto them due by the former pacification made at Vienna An. 1606. Which troubles of Austria the Nobilitie and States of Hungary desiring to have appealed, fent George Turson and some others with letters of intercession in their behalfe vnto the Archduke Maximilian : which when they had delinered vnto him, they received from him this answer, That K. Mat. thias never thought to disturb the common quiet of that country, or to attempt any thing against the printledges therof, granted by the Emperor Maximilian of happy memory ; but to grant vnto the cities the liberty of Religion, he could by no meanes, partly in respect of conscience, partly for the danger that might therof insue from the Pope and the king of Spaine and yet heuertheles he would promise to suffer and tolerate the free exercise of religion without the city, and in the bestowing of publique offices to have no respect of Religion; yet with

A crown yet on his head, and in his stately robes, went out of the city at S. Michaels gate, where on horseback he was brought unto an high stage couered with cloath, wheron hee was sworne unto the Hungarians as their King, and they unto him as his subjects. And afterwards thrice mounting vp to horse vpon a little hil made for that purpose, and so downe againe, and thrice brandithing his fword acrosse, he returned back again into the castle, where he and Maximilian the Archduke, Cardinal Forgatsie the Popes Nuntio, and the Palatine sate down at one table the rest of the Hungarian Nobilitie, to the number of 70, sitting down at six other tables, and fo dining with great mirth; the Haiduks and common fort of people being there bountifully feafted alfo. Where many of them in scrambling for the money that was cast abroad, and in taking up of the cloath from the scaffold, having their hands and fingers cut off, & so lamed.

The folemnitie of this coronation thus past, King Matthias thought it good for him yet for a time to flay at Presburg, until the new building in the castle was ended, which the nobility of Hungarie had appointed for the keeping of the Crown of Hungary, to the intent that hee himselfe might see the same, with other the royall ornaments put thereinto, and scaled up with his own feal: he in the meanwhile labouring to appeale great contentions, and to place fit men again in the great offices of the commonweale; for that the Hungarians would by no means suffer the Germans to enjoy any of the same : for which cause many of the chiefe officers, men of great authoritic, were displaced; and among them Sigifrid Collonisz, a man who had much deserved of the kingdom of Hungary. Howbeit shortly after, he by the counsel of Maximilian the Archduke, was by the Hungarians themselves, repenting them of that they had done, not only restored vnto his former offices, but had by them (and that not without his iust desert euen greater preserments offered him also: so mutable a thing the judgment of the Common people is. But Illi shaseisis now Palatine of Hungary, the 28 of November talking with king Matthias at large, earnestly intreated him in the behalfe of the protestant States of Austriates pecially for that the other Protestant States of Hungary seemed now in their behalfe to be much mooued alfo, and the Moravian Embassadors openly at the same time protesting. That their States could in no wife for sake them their friends the States of Austria, if their need forequired. And albeit that both the Elector of Saxony and other Princes of the Empire, we're become earnest intercessors also vinto the King for them; yet the Popes Nuntio so hardly withstood them, as nothing could as then be granted.

El About the beginning of December the king returning again from Presburg to Vienna, the Protestant States of Austria about the 16 of December sent Ernestus the free Baron of Landau, Maximilian Bolhein, Sebastian Grobner, Charles Forberger, Pilgram Sitsendorff, and Christopher Buchner, their Embashadors vnto the King, to know what they should trust to. Who the 27 of December received answer. That they should hold themselves contented with such answer as they had before received, and to submit themselves to the kings pleasure; or els to doe what they themselves thought good. With which answer they returning the States forthwith began to leuly new forces: perfuading the foldiers, that mindful of their oaths they should truly scrue whichers oeuer and against whom socuer they were sent. B And now a great army of the Protostant States of Austria lay in the villages about Cremb- 160 Q. fa and Spaine, so that those two towns were thought to bee in great danger of them. For the The States of strengthning of which places Bucheime was by the King fent thither with 1500 horse, & cer- Austria in tain pieces of great ordnance; and aniedict withall published the 10 of Ianuary, charging the arm about re-States to be present at Vienna the 2x day of the same moneth, to take their oath of allegiance to the king. Howbeit they most stilly still resulted so to do, or to remit any thing of that they bad before required. Infomuch that Maximilian the Archduke, who hitherto had not a little labored in this cause, was quite out of hope to bring them to any conformitie, or to make any good end therof. In the mean time certaine of Bucheims horfemen on the kings part, being about to haueaaken vp a place, such as they thought concenient for them to lodge in, had like to have bin diffappointed of the fame by the horsemen of Gerrane on the States side. About which matter Bucheim comming forth with 7 troups of horsmen, and Gerrane but with three. and three companies of foor, there was betwire them an hor skirmish for the time, fought the thirteenth day of lanuary, in which an Hundred of Bucheims horsemen were staine, but of Gerrane his men not formany, they having the advantage of the ground, and so therewith in Rrrrr 3

the skirmish holpen, both for the defence of themselves, and the annoying of their enemies. G Wherof the King having knowledge, and therwith much mooned, befide the aforefaid Edia, caused another to be proclaimed at Vienna, against such souldiers as served the protessant proferibing them all, and denouncing them Rebels, except before the 2 t day of lanuarie, they protestioning them any amount of the protestants Campe. Howbeit the Protestant States were to far from dismissing their forces, as that they with new supplies strengthed the same and having taken an hil not far from Hallen ynne, and from thence discharging three tyre of 20 pieces of great ordnance, ftrook a great fear and terror into the minds of the kings foldiers

About this time also the States of Moravia (that nothing might on their part becwanting for the making of an attonement betwixt the king and the Protestant States of Austria) fent H fome of their Embassadors vnto those States at Horn, and other some vnto the King at Vienna, who having accesse vnto the King, declared vnto him, The States of Moravia, from whom they came, to be earnestly importuned by the protestant States of Austria, to send them ayd, according to the agreement made with them the year before. And told him moreouer, That this maner of his proceeding tended not vnto peace and quietnes, but rather vnto the trouble and destruction both of the kingdome and of all the provinces to him belonging. All that crrour, the ground of those troubles, they said to depend vpon a corrupt interpretation or misconstruing of words, rather than of the matter it selfe; so that by men desirous of peace, it might easily be composed and ended. And that therfore their request vnto his Majesty was; That he having regard not only vnto the good and welfare of his provinces and subjects, but I euen of himfelfe and of his honour alfo, would of his elemencie and goodnesse vouchsafe to giue remedy vnto the present danger, and auert the miserable calamities now hanging ouer them, and even ready to fall vpon their heads, The protestant States, they faid to be content to put the controuer sie to be decided and composed by certain grave & wife men, to be chofen arbitrators on both parts; yet with this condition; That for 14 daies space no hostilitie should on either side be vsed. That the inhabitants both aboue and beneath Amisum should be comprised within this truce. That such as were kept in durance for religion should bee set at libertie; and that all highwaies and paffages should be from all ambushes and other dans gers cleated. Unto which their requests the king condescending, gaue leane vnto the States of Moravia, upon the most equal conditions they could deutle to compose and end all different & cesswho fo laboured in this buffueffe betwint the King and the protestant States of Austria, The troubles in that at length, viz. the twelith of March; a pacification was made betweene them : Lapold chief Archduke Melinus the Popes Nunrio, the Bithopof Vienna, and other great men of the contrary religion and faction, feeking invain to hinder the fame. The chiefarticles and points is the Pacification were these: That the Nobility in their castles and towns, as also in their hose fes in the city, should for themselves and their people liaue the free exercise of the intelligious That the free exercise of preaching might be vied in three Churches, at Heridord, Taibelfuidcel, and Horn. That the other Churches shubyp might again be opened by three of the Rea mith and three of the Reformed religion, and the free exardife of Religion in themseled. That Counsellors and other publique officers should from shence forth industreently be cholenof I men of both religions; but such Offices as were hereditarie should soffill remains. That the clection of Magistrates and other publique Officers in towns and cities, should from thence forth be made by the Magistrates and Citisens themselves, and not to be mominated from the Court, as hitherto they had beene. That no Church should bee hereafter shut against either part, but their own Churches to be left vnto them both, quietly to see That the gowholmen and Citisens in their townes and Cities should from thenceforth have power to make abligation of their ministers and preachers, and that for them is should be lawfull so wifit the sicker and to administer vnto them the Lords Supper That the path of Allegiance should betakend them of the Reformed religion, inelike maner as it had beene before taken of them of the lies mith, but yet not with the same ceremonics of the Roman church; all vaicie and confederate M on with them to be had, to be taken away. That all gradging hatred and quartel flouid ble on both sides forgiuen, and for euer forgotten. Wolfgang of Hoffkirelt, volifging, and others removed and put from their offices for not taking the orb of allegiance heling again received into fauor and restored to their places. That it might beliawful for the nowns and cities about

A Amisum, to have the free exercise of the Reformed religion in their suburbs and hospitals. It was not long after this pacification made, but that king Mathias the 17 of May, going to Lintze with 300 horse, was there with eight troups of horsmen & fifteen companies of foot, by the States sent forth to meet him, most honorably receited, and by three triumphal arches brought into the city : where he received of the States of the religion the oath of obedience; which with much ioy, triumph, and feasting performed, he the 27 of the same moneth againe returned to Vienna. The aforesaid States of Austria in the mean time with great zeal continuing the free exercise of their Religion at Horn, a great multitude of people daily reforting vnto the fermons there made: they of the Romish religion much gricuing and fretting therat. The King himselse also being come to Vienna, put divers of the Romish Catholiques out of their offices, placing others of the Reformed religion in their rooms, to the great discontentment of many.

About this time the Baffa of Agria, notwith standing the peace, had for the sum of twenty thousand crowns before hand payd, secretly compacted with one Andrew Drake, to have the firong town of Filek in the upper Hungary delivered vnto him. Which the traitor had intended (as he himfelf confessed) to have performed, by setting of the house wherin he himself dwelt, by night on fire watto the quenching wherof the garifon foldiers reforting, his purpole was in the mean time to have fecretly let in the Turks, and so to have delivered the town into their hands. But this his fowicked a purpose in good time discouered, and by him confessed, he was therfore, as he had wel deserued, aliue cut into four pieces; a just reward for his so foul intended treason. The Bassa of Buda also contrary to the treaty of peace about the same time went about to have exacted the oath of allegiance of aboue 400 country villages of the Christians being not comprised within the foresaid treaty. But as the Turks for their part were secretly plotting how to incroch upon the Christians, and to do them harm; so the Haiducks on the other fide in great numbers gathered together in the vpper Hungary, began here and there to molest and trouble the Turks, until they were by their superiors commanded to defift from folloing, for diffurbing of the peace.

Now about this time also Illestratorus the County Palatine of Hungary died at Vienna; A Influstrius man much beloued of the Hungarians his countrymen, and now by them no leffe lamented dieb. for. Whose dead body was with great honor asterward conveyed from Vienna, onto his owne D territorie in Hungary, and there with all funeral pomp burled with his Ancestors. In whose Read George Purson was afterward by the general consent of 150 of the Hungarian Nobilitie chosen County Palatine of Hungary, and so with the universal and solemn acclamations of the people lalitted. And now the troubles for religion were fearchly wel ended in Auftria (as is aforefaid) but New Troubles that the like, of rather worle, begatt forthwith even for the fame quatrel to arife in Bohemia ; for religion in the Huffites (as they call them) molt carnefly importuning the Emperor for the free exercise Bobinit. of their Renigion, or father for the taking away of certaine griduances done to their religion : and the Roman Catholighes even at the fame time leaving nothing vnattempted, that might ferue to bring them of the Religion mothatted with the Emperour and others fitting at the helm of the gouernment of efface, and fo to fruffrat what foculer the Emperor had in the general assembly of the Stares the last year granted vito them of the Religion, for the free exercife and attivation therof. The composing of which controverse (rending vnto the tending in funder of the whole kingdom) when as the Emperor had referred vnto certain of his cheefe Confidence, and they altogether favoring the Roman Catholiques, would give them of the Religionno certain answer wherein to rell they therwith much discontented, as out of hope to by electricite ved, and in great fear to be by their adner faries, as enemies unto the flate oppressed, layd their heads together, and after good deliberation taken, What were best for them to doe, both for the fafety of themselues, their wines, children, and Religion; they by a general confent, of themselves appointed the south of May to hold a general meeting of them of the Religion in the new Court at Prague, there to confult of all matters concerning the buffineffe BPReligion. And yet in the mean time openly in parliament protesting, by the mouth of Wentellaus Bodavii fin a Baron of Bohemia, them to have appointed this Affembly for the Emperors good and for the common quiet of the whole realme; as also for the better informing informing of the Emperor of all matters, and to provide that the Emperor and the kingdom G might not through the means and persuasions of those his eutil Counsellors be brought into extream peril and danger. Immediatly after, the States of the Religion with all speed disparched their Embassadors vnto King Matthias, the Elector Palatine, the Duke of Saxonie, and the Duke of Brunswick, to request them, by their intercession to become mediators for them vnto the Emperor, for the obtaining of the free exercise of their religion, which in all points agreed with the Confession of Augusta, and hich long before was exhibited vnto Maximili. an the Emperor, and by him allowed. Now in the mean time these the States of the Religion were by some for these their proceedings commended; but by other some not onely blas med, but also accused of rebellion against the Emperor and the State. But the matter beeing declared vnto the Emperour, he complaining vnto himselse of the inconsideratenesse of his H Counsellors; to maintain his authoritie, caused the Parliament then in hand to be prorogued: and to feem of himfelf to grant that which he could not wel withstand, commanded by a Decree, that same very day to be appointed for the concluding of that article of Religion, on which the States themselves had appointed their affembly to be holden in the new Court at Prague. Notwithstanding which Decree, many troublesome spirits, publiquely set sorth other their conceits in writing, to far other purpose; grieuously therin reprehending the states of the Religion, for that of themselves they had appointed a day for their affembly into the new Court at Prague: which (as they faid) was nothing elfe, but in a rebellious maner torife against the Lawes of the kingdome, and the authoritie of their lawfull Prince; and therefore aduited them to forbear from making any fuch affembly as was by them appointed. Hereof I arose great troubles even under the Emperors nose, in Prague the chief city of Bohemia, they of the Religion not daring to trust the Roman Catholiques, neither they them: beeing still ready upon enery falle report or vain furmife to go together by the cars 4 untill that the Em. peror for the staying of these troubles, and for the avoiding of further danger, was glad to cause it to be openly proclaimed in the new Court at Prague, That his Imperiall Maiestie having received and understood the Apologie of the States, now did abrogate that his Edice published against them but a few daies besore; and now by this his new Edict did account all the States of the Religion for his faithfull and welbeloued Subjects, and as of them, vnto whom the right of the kingdom and the Kings oath belonged, as well as to all the other flates of the kingdome. And that hee also had those the same States excused, in that they for the K good of his Majesty & of the whole kingdom had appointed their Assembly in the new court at Prague; and that therefore he denounced them in fo doing, not to have don anything contrary vnto his Majesty. And that he appointed the 25 day of May for the generall assembly of Parliament to be holden in the Castle of Prague, for the ending of the Article concerning Religion, and the reforming of other the publique grinusques of the Commonwest Yes with this prouiso, That the faid States should fafely and quietly come vnto, the patliament without entertaining of any forrein foldiers : as that his Majestie should also, not by himselfener any other, for pay entertaine any, or fuffer any forreine fouldiers, to come into the kingdoms. Which the Emperors Edict being proclaimed, the Scates of the Religion having made their publique prayers, and fung certain hymnes and platmes ynto the glory of God, for the good L fuccesse of their busines, left the new court at Prague, and returned every man home to their own houses, to make themselves ready to come unto the Rayliament wiso be holdener the sppointed day.

But the day appointed for the Parliament being come, and the Emperous still delaying the matter, the States of the Religion weaty of such long delayes, and in doubt to be therewith deluded, as having not received from the Emperous any such answer, as whereon they might reft; the third of June offered vnto the Emperoura short yviring opperning their griefe and further purpole, to this effect, They had (as they faid) expected, and well hoped, That regard beeing had not onely of formany requests, of fo great, and most poble Princes made in their behalfe, but even of the Emperour his promile allo made wnto them, both in the M generall Assembly of the States the last years, and in the late precept of the Emperous alla they should at length have received such answer vnto their perition, concerning the free exercisc of their Religion, as wheron they might have safely rested. Which for that it had not him

A yet don, they referred the doing therof vato God and further time, imputing the blame therof not vnto his Imperial Maielty, but vnto the vnquier and troublefome natures of some as well the Ecclesiastical as Temporall magistrats and persons. But forestmuch as they meant no longer to be deluded by their enemies, much lesse to be defrauded of his Maiesties Royal promile, which was now vinto the world known; they had thought good to offer and present unto his Maiesty a writing conceined in the Bohemiantongue, according unto which they defired to be fecured concerning the free exercise of their Religion : most humbly requesting his Maiefly to accept of the same, and at length to satisfie their requests. Which if it might not be granted (the Emperours Maiesty having more respect vnto the troublesome Clergie men, and some other his cuill affected Counsellors, than euche faithfuil States and subjects of B his kingdome) that then they would rest themselves vpon the Decree made in the Assembly holden in the year 1608, and vpon the last Edict of his Maiefty: yet with this folenin protestation, That seeing they had by certain information understood, much warlike preparation, especially in Bavaria, to be made, and divers consultations in many places to be held against the States of the Religion (his Imperial Maiesty and other his faithful counsellors knowing nothing therof) which might tend vato the ruin and destruction both of his Maiesty and of the whole kingdom; they themselves would take vpon them the desence the reof, & do their indeauor, that firmished with men and armes, they might to the remost of their power defend him their Soueraign, together with themselues and the whole kingdome, against the muslion

In the mean time while there things were thus in doing, an Embaffadour came from the Duke of Saxonje to Prague, to intreat the Emperour for the States, and for the granting of them the free exercise of their Religion. The Embassadors of the States of Silesia forthwith following of them also who also requested of the Emperor, to have the liberty for the free exercife of their Religion by him confirmed vnto themspromifing their most ready help & aid vino the States of Bohemia, if need should so require. But the States of Bohemia having in vain from day to day expeded answer from the Emperour, turning themselues vnto their former telourion for the defence of themselves and or their Religion; forthwith raised a great number both of horse and soot; who with their well known Captains and commanders they brought euen vnto the city of Prague. Howbeit at length, viz. the eleuenth day of July, the D $1x0n Embaffadours carnefily foliciting their caufe, and viging their request, according to their defire received answer from the Emperour, by letters from his Maiesty written to this

He gaue all men (as he faid) to understand, and by these his Letters witnessed to eternal! The Emptors memory, That after that all the tree States of his kingdome of Bohemia, which in the recei-free exactes uing of the Lords Supper participate the body and bloud of our Lord Christ Icsus vnder Referance. both kinds, his faithfull subiects, had in the Assembly holden in the Castle at Prague, in the bim a. year 1608, in all humilitie reque aed, That it might be lawfull for them to hold, and freely to exercise their Religion according to the Contession of Augusta (as some call it) exhibited vnto his father Maximilian the Emperour, of most happy memory, and by him to the sayd E States, allowed: and that he then and at that time, by reason of other most weighty busines, for which that affembly was then called, and fuch as could fuffer no procrastination or delay, had thought it good to defer the allowing and ratifying of this their petition, vnto this prelent affembly of Parliament : and that the same States now again affembled, inceffantly renewing this their former petition and having therunto loyned also the request and intercefsion of certain noble personages, had requested to be therein satisfied : and that hee and his Counsellors would consult, how provision might be made for his subjects in the kingdome of Bohemia, as wel communicating under both kinds as under one; now at length to have efseded the same. Wherefore seeing that his will and defire was, in these and future times peace and quietnesse might for the increasing of the Kingdome, be preserued and kept amongst his subjects of all the three Estates of the kingdom of Bohemia, communicating as well under the one as under both kinds: That both parties might freely and without any impediment or let, have the free exercise of their Religion, whereby they were both in hope to obtain euerlasting saluation. And to the intent that accomplishment and satisfaction might in all points be made, as well according to the breaking up of the Affembly of Parliament in G the yeare, 1608, as to the performance of his own precept, of late published (whereby he hath acknowledged, and even acknowledgeth, those same Estates communicating vader both kinds, and subscribing to this confession, for his faithfull and loyall subjects, vito whom the rights and immunities of the kingdome of Bohemia belonged) he by the common confert of the Councellors, and other Magistrates of the Kingdome, did determine, That his subjects communicating both under one and both kinds, should friendly and peacably line together, without wronging or reuiling of one another; and that vpon the paine and penalty in the law fet downe, to bee inflicted vpon them that should otherwise do. And moreouer, seeing that they which communicated but vnder one kinde, enjoyed the free exercise of their Religion in all points throughout the kingdome of Bohemia, that he gaue leave and commanded, that H they allowhich communicated under both kindes, viz. all the States of the Religion, with all such as embraced the Confession of Bohemia, sometime exhibited to Maximilian the Emperour his father, in the Parliament holden in the yeare 1575, and now againe to himfelfe presented, should every where and in all places of the Kingdome, have the free exercife of their Religion, without the let or interruption of any ; to retaine the same, vitilla generallynion of Religion, and an ending of all diffention and controucrites might be made, Moreouer, That he did grant ento the States of the Religion this fauour, That they should haue the lower Confistorie at Prague, with power to conforme the same according to their owne Confession. That they might lawfully make their Priests, as well in the Bohemian as Germane Tongue, and set them ouer their Churches, without any let of the Archbishop I of Prague. That hee did also restore vnto them the Universitie of Prague, which for many yeares agoe belonged vnto the States of the Religion vnder both kindes: giuing them power againe to open the same, to furnish it with grave and learned men of their owne Confession, to beautifie it with good Lawes, and to appoint certaine of their owne companie and professional on for Gouernours and defendors as well of the Confistorie as of the Universitie: whom so by the states appointed and chosen, he without any stay or delay, or other instruction or information than they should from the States receive, would confirme in that their office, and pronounce them for the lawfull Defendors : yet fo, as that if he being letted by other great builnesse, cannot performe the same within the space of sourceen days, they shall neverthelescontinue Defendors, and as well enjoy the charge of the Office committed vnto them, as if they K had been therein by him confirmed : and that one or other of their number being dead, it shall be lawfull for the States to chuse other in their places. And if that beside the Churches which they now hold, they would build other moe, or creck more schooles for the instructing of the youth, it shall bee lawfull for them freely and without any let so to doe, as well in the Cities as in the Countrey Townes and villages. And for a funch as in some of the Cities of the Kingdome of Bohemia, men of both Religions did dwell-together, he therefore didwill and command, That for the preservation of peace and quietnesse, either part freely exercifing their Religion, and obeying their Priests, should by no means either hurt or trouble them on the other part; and much lesse to hinder them to bury their dead in their Churchet or Churchyards, with the ringing or tolling of their Bels, or goe about to turne any man from bis L Religion, of what state or condition soeuer he be, whether hee dwell in the City or in the Countrey Towne or village; or by force to draw them to their opinion, or to take their part. For that he onely respected that peace and quietnesse might bee kept, and that mutuall lose might still grow amongst all the three States: Vnto which end and purpose, that he for himfelfe and his heires, the King of Bohemia his Successors, in the faith and word of a King, did grant and promise vnto the States of the Religion, vnto whom this common peace of Religion (as they call it) belongs, as to a principall member of the Empire, all these things to befor euer inuiolably kept (the ecclesiastical and temporal) persons what socue resisting) so that no contrary precept or Edica, should either by himself, or any other his heirs or successors be published against the States of the religion; or being published by any, should be accompted effer M Auall and ftrong, especially seeing that he by these letters, pronounces all the Edicks hitherto published against these the states of the religion to be void frustrate, and of none effect. Neither would that any thing of those which were don by the States of the Religion whilk they

A fought for the confirmation of this article concerning Religion should for ever be laid vnto their charge, or by any man by way, of reproch objected vnto them. And that therefore hee streitly charged and commanded all Magistrats, and such as bare rule in Bohemia, that they should to the vnnost of their power protect & defend alghe three States, together with them of the Religion, and neither themselves to trouble them, nor suffer them to be by any others for the exercise of their Religion molested or troubled: for that hee and other the Kings of Bohemia his successfors, would mode severely chastise all such as should offend against these publique Records of Parliament) whether such of sended the would cause to be involled in the sharply punished as troublets of the common peace.

B This was the fum of his Majesticis letter, which he caused to bee publiquely set vp in the castle of Prague the 13 of sully, that it mighe betto all men knowne, this article of Religion, which was the first of the articles in this parliament to be concluded and agreed upon accorfied. Who forthwith therupon the sitteenth of July caused the first publique sermon accorfied. Who forthwith therupon the sitteenth of July caused the first publique fermon accorfied to the consession of Augusta, to be preached in the German tongue in a church of them unto the Elector of Saxonie, to send unto them certain learned men, for the setting up of the Vniuersitie, and the governing of the Consistory at Prague. And yet for all this, the Embassion to be granted to the said States and the rest of the inhabitants of the province; the states of Bohemia resused in any wise to dismisse their coldiers whom they had mustred neere unto Roggenson, until the Silesians were of their request in that point satisfied offring also to the Emperor a large label of the faid States griefs.

Now it may be some having read so much as is before written concerning these late troubles about the free exercise of the Resormed Religion, but especially in Bohemia, Austria, Moravia, and Silesia, may deeme the same both tedious and beside our purpose. Vnto whom indeed it is not written, but rather vnto such as who together with my selfe (the Warres betwixt the Christians and the Turks ended, and the peace concluded as is aforesaid) desire to know in what state those frontier Countries stand, which being the greatest bulwarks of that D side of Christiandome, and the chiese territories of the House of Austria, are (the peace being either expired or otherwise broken off) most subject vnto the sury of the puissant enemy, as nearest vnto him, and so like soonest to seel his great force and power, which prefineth vnto it selfe neither bounds nor measure, whilst there is any thing farther to be had. Against whom the Christian Emperor had no forces of his owne to oppose, more than such as he could raise out of the reliques of Hungary, and the aforesaid frontier Countries; all together but weake helpes against so puissant an enemy, as never commeth into the field but with a world of men following him. But yet much weaker, being as now of late they were, every one of them apart divided in themselves about matters of Religion, the incredible maladies of the Christian Estates and Commonweales. The heavy and lamentable effect whereof too much of

E late appeared in the losse of Strigonium, won by the Turks with a farre lesse army than ever the Grand Seigniors Lieutenant General was wont to come into Hungary; and yet the Christian Emperor by reason of the reuolt of the Hungarians, vpon a discontentment about the exercise of their Religion, not able of himselfe to relieue the distressed city of Strigonium, or yet to take the field with an army of any strength, for desence of the rest of his cities or territories. So weak are even the greatest princes, their subjects being amongst themselves divided in minds.

But to stray further: The Turks Embassador in the mean time with a notable traine of an hundred and fifty Turks comming from Vienna the one and twentieth of September, and there having saluted and with great gifts presented the King, set forward towards Prague, where he was by the citisens and certain noblemen of the Emperors counsel, the 12 of Odober honourably received, and the nineteenth of the same month admitted unto the Emperors presence, first presented to him from the great Sultan his master a rich Tent of divers colors, most curiously wrought with saire Orient Pearle of great value; and then source couragious horses, all furnished with most rich and sumptuous furniture. Hee presented voto him also G certain Turkish weapons set and garnished with pregious stones; and a princely Turks Robe fuch as they vie at their mariages, gliffring with gold and pretious frones, with divers other rare things of lesse value. Together with which he deliuered vnto him the great Sultans let. ters; and withall defired the confirmation of the peace before made for twenty yeares, to be now again renewed.

Vinto which Embassadour letters were afterwards deliuered from the Emperour, together with certain other rich presents to be by him presented vnto the great Sultan :viz. certaine Caroches lined within with Damaske, and covered without with black veluet; fix faire and gallant horses most richly furnished; a Clocke of wonderfull workmanship; two fair Desker to write voon of Ebonie: with divers other like Presents of no small price. Whose H charged with prefents, and bountifully rewarded, and to his good liking an. swered, was afterward in the beginning of lanuary, with a train of 200 horse from Prague honourably difmiffed.

HERE FOLLOWETH A CONTINUA-TION OF THIS PRESENT HISTORY (CONTAI-NING THOSE OCCURRENTS WHICH HAVE HAPPENED TO THE TVRKISH EMPIRE SINCE THE YEARE OF OVR LORD, 1609, TO THE YEAR 1917, &c.) By EDWARD GRIMSTON, Sergeant at Armes.

He Turkish Emperour, having beene freed some yeares from the 1616 care of wars in Hungary, in regard that he had concluded a truce for twenty yeares with the Emperor Rodulphus, he now bent all his forces against his Rebels in Asia, and the Sophy of Persia, where he had no good successe this yeare. For the Persians having formerly extended their Monarchy far into the Turkish Empire, and defeated Cicala Baffa and others in divers battels a now they entered into the Province of Babylon, with a defigne to joyne it to The Persiane Petsia. Achmat to stay the course of their prosperity, sends a migh. enter in a the ty army thither, under the command of Nasht Bassa: but his for Babyles, tune was no better than those that went before him. The Persians came to meet him, gaue him battell, defeated him, and flew 20000 of his men. These mourn The Tarks full newes comming to Court, did much diffemper the Sultans minde, he could not endure defeated. it should be faid that the Persians had descated his mighty armies thrice in open battell; and D much leffe that it should be so, and that he should seife upon his countries : wherefore to repaire this losse, he levies new forces to be commanded by Combolat Bassa of Aleppo, who had bin the most powerfull Rebel in Assaud was newly reconciled and brought into fagor with the grand Seignfor. This man came to the Port to receive the Sultans commandements, and and to paffe his army into Afia i but whether having some suspicion, that he had intelligence with the Persians, or that such as entitled his greatnesse, had given some bad impression of his loyalty to the Sultan; within some sew daies after his artivall, Achma caused him to be flain by his Carrier. Whereby we may well observe, that he that is a Rebell to his Prince, which hath fo violently oppress his subjects, and fee his countries on fire by sedition, the which he hath bin forced to questly with the bloud of innocents, cannot but end his daics violently and E miserably seeing that God revengeth the blond of innocents you the guilty.

The Persian seeing what advantage he had gotten of the Turke, laboured by the bruit of his victories to draw the Christian Princes victohis party, and with them wholly to ruine the Othomans the which he had so happily begun. For the effecting whereof the sent his Embaltadors to the Emperor being at Prague, to perfuade him to breake the peace with the Turke, and to foldewith him. The Embassadors arrived at Prague this yeard wich rich and rare Pro- Profess four fents: first a troffe of word inticht with many pretious stones; amongs which there was one . the Empere plece of antier, wherehi was seene the figure of the Virgin Mary, holding hor young babe in by the Perfian ber armes the which was fo artificially graven, at it might be thought the worke, of nature : a Topas of exceeding greatnessegiven to the King of Perauby an Indian King two knives of F damaske, with hafes of jalper, and their theaths coursed with diamondars certaine kind of Indish wood of moft eggstlent vertue most four reigne to our the paines of the brest, and to purge the flooracker the gall of a pellican excellent to cure the plurific, appoplexic, and fethe two topazes the one white, and the other violet; this laft was fo big, as it was capable to make a cup : an Amathift as big as a hensegge, a Perfian bow inlaid with the veines of a camell, and a rough diamond exceeding great; a white stone of the colour of water, which G was a preferuative against the plague, being hung about ones necke; three orientall pearles was a preservative against the property and three manuellous faire diamonds; and withall this exceeding Digitures rich elemed for the rare vertues. All these Presents were very well accept a terpents nome, mount, the fair will ted, and the Embassadors much honoured. But what apparance was there for the Emperor, who had so great differences with his brother Matthea King of Hungary, who saw the greatest part of his subjects rebelled against him, his provinces in division, Transylvania in combustion by the conspiracy which had bin discouered against Batters, and finally a generall disorder ouer all, to breake the peace with the Turke, (who was at his dore, retained only with this bar) and to allie himselfe with the Persian so far from his countries, from whom he could draw no succors, but only that he might keep the Othoman busie in Asia? Thus the Embassa. H dors returned, carrying home nothing but good words.

The troubles which hapned in Bohemia, made him see of what importance it was to entertaine peace with the Turke: for if he had broken it by the Persians persuasion, hee had giuen his enemy an affured meanes to ruine him : for the Archduke Leopold intred into Bohemia with an army of 9000 foot, and 3000 horse; he surprised petty Prague, attempted the old towne, and seeking to force it, he slew many which made resistance. Masthias King of Hungary aduertised of this disorder, parts from Austria with a powerfull army, and advanceth specdily towards Bohemia. It was to be feared, that if Matthias army and Leopolds had met nect voto Prague, it had been the loffe and ouerthrow of the one, and the defolation and ruine of the country. The Emperor forefeeing this danger, caused 300000 florens to be deliuered to Romeo, Leopolds Lieutenant, for the paiment of his army, and fo fent him out of Bohemia. This diuision betwixt the Princes of the house of Austria, grew by the practiles of some of the Em. perors Counfell, who being deligated judges to compound the differences of the Bohemians of diuers religions, in flead of labouring to reconcile and white those people, for the good of the publike, they made themselves partisans to the one to oppresse the other, and therby they drew the Princes into a dangerous division, for the support of parties. And moreover, the Archdukes Ferdinand and Leopold, practifed to deprine Matthias King of Hungary of the fuccession which he pretended of Bohemia; lest that being master, he should take reuenge vpon their partifans for the croubles wherewith they had formerly affliced the country. Such was the estate of affaires in Germany, giving the Turke a faire opportunity, if he should have embraced fo rich an occasion, to make his profit of their combustions. But the confirmation of the truce, and the affaires of his house kept him in Thrace.

The gallism of Let us fee how the Turke speeds at fea; where he hath the Knights of Malta, the Sicilians, Malia defeated and Neapolitanes, and the Florentines, vigilant and valiant enemies to annoy him, and croffe his defigues. The last yeare, which was 1609, the Christians had no good successe, losse fell particularly vpon the Knights of Malta; for he that fights often can hardly vanquish alwaies. The gallion of the Order, commanded by Chinalier Guideri, an Italian, had made two voyages to sea very fortunatly, and brought to Malta 300 Turkish slaves. The encouragement of this good successe engaged many Knights to dinera enterprises, They armed certain gallions, and made a fleet of ten good ships of war, as unfortunat in their courses as the gallion of the Order L had before beene successefull s for meeting with the Turks fleer in the seas of Cyprus, they were fet vpon, and most of them slaine or made slaues. The Knight Erestines was slaine, and the red gallion wherein he commanded, taken by the Turks but it was after a whole daies fight Ambajon otherwise called Fueillade another Knight, was made a flaue; and his gallion takes: the Knight Owers run the same fortune, with the losse of a gallion. Refinet basing broughts pinnace with him to attend his firip, after some fight scere vnto the galllon, it escaped by night. In this voiage infortunat for shem of Malta, the gallion of the Order would need feete fome better adventure: the Knighth of Buillen and Rhotles slid accompany bim gisher of these with a finall gallion. He fet vponube cavarant of the Turks flest occursing Island of the Rhodes, his successefull beginning of this combat made him hope for visions, and the number of the M enemies veffels for a rich bodyn for therowers among the refl two great gallions of the Subtans; these are thips which belong to the Great Selenion women logen commonly with great riches: but so gallies of Racides feeing this fight potte of their port to fugeor them, and by the fauour of a faire wind drew them into faletya za will za fill the se as a quit a fill the se as a quit a

At Malta the bruit was, That the Turks army confifting of fourfcore gallies, should go and beliege the Isle of Goza, whereas a Knight called Saint-Liger commanded. Whereupon the Great Master had resolued to fortifie the Castle of the Island, with a good counterscarfe, which he caused to be made, sending thither two hundred souldiers, and thirty Knights for supply, all braue souldiers, who might have made a great resistance, if the Turks had attempted it : but the enemies fleet passed on and gaue them time to rest.

But this yeare 1610, Vignaucours the Great Master of Malta, sent the fine gallies of the Order into Barbary, towards the Port Farino, memorable, for that it was the hauen where S. Lewis the French King ended the nauigation of his daies, and at his returne from lerufalem and Pa. lestine, went to receive in Heaven the glorious palmes of his holy actions. The gallies of Biferta had accustomed to fetch palmes there in that season (which was in the Spring time) whom the gallies of Malta had a defigne to furprise. But the contrary winds, and the tempefluous seas ouerthrew that enterprise; yet their voiage was not altogether vnprofitable; for returning towards Malta, being within the channell, which divides the Island from that of Sicily, they encountered with a great gallion of Tunes, armed by a Turke called Caronfinan, being in view of the gallies of Malta: The Rayle (who commanded) affured his company, and fmiling promised to free them from their enemics. Being so transported with vanity, as he fpake confidently, that he would not feare twenty of the gallies of Malta: but this his pride was foone abated with his ruine; for the fine gallies came close under him, and plied him fo furiously with their cannon, as they funke him. The gally wherein Verdella an Italian Knight commanded, had like to have beene loft, for being grapled with the gallion, if the diligence of Verdille had not speedily retired it. The Turks after the loffe of their vessell, began to swing away, but they were all made flaues to ferue in the gallies of Malta, who this yeare had no other fruits of their generous enterprises.

The gallies of Cosmo de Medicis great Duke of Tuskany, parted from Ligorne, under the The course of conduct of the Commander and Admirall Inghirain, and running along the coast of Barba- the Date of the coast of Barba- Tufeny his ry, they tooke a Turkish ship in the sight of Algier, loaden with merchandise, armes, and mu- Galler. nition of war freeing many Christian slaves which were in it. This happy beginning promised them better fortune. They passe on, and some twenty fine leagues beyond Algiers they goe to surprise the towne of Bisquirre, a small towne in circuit, but strong and well walled.

D Inghirami drawing neere ento the coast, tooke downe his masts, lest they should discouer his comming. In the meane time he fent two long boats to find some place fit for their landing; the which being carefully observed, Colonell Bindy landed his men, and about eleven a clocke at night marched in good order towards the towne, and forced it. The darkenesse of the night kept them from spoiling it; being content only to set their guards and sentinels in the most important places of the wall: but day being come, the fouldiers made themselues masters of the towne, which they facked and spoiled. Certaine Moores and Turks, during the obscurity of the night, had retired themselues into a Mosque which they fortified: They were summoned to yeeld; but the feare of being flaues, (which they could not avoid) made them refolue to die in their owne defence; fo as the Florentines having forced the place, put them all to I fword; and then embarqued their troups, having filled Bisquirre with fire and bloud. The night following, being in the gulph called the Bad woman, they met with a pinnace loaden with corne, the which they tooke, and fent to Ligorne, and then they put on to encrease their conquest. Being voon the coast of Sardinia, two Galliots of Biferta did furnish them with a faire occasion. Inchirami sendeth his gallies to pursue them, who having had them in chase threescore leagues, tooke the one, wherin they had one hundred and twenty slaues, and freed many poore Christians from the chaine, who suffered the tyranny of the Turkish services. They also tooke a Turkish gally within halfe a league of Algier, and spoiled it. And thus triumphing ouer their enemies, they tooke their course towards Ligorne, having taken source Turkish vessels, spoiled the towne of Bisquerre, and twice braued that of Algier.

This yeare was fatall for the Morifques or new Christians in Spaine, who being in number The Morifques nine hundred thousand persons, as the original lwrites, and had continued there from father to or new christia. fon, for the space of almost nine hundred yeares, were now in an instant banished, and made of spaint. vagabonds with the blaft of the Kings mouth. Men discoursed diversly hereof: Some faid, that the King had reason to do it, for that they had secret practifes and intelligences with the Turke his capitall enemy. Others affirmed, that hee did wifely to preuent their attempts G against his Estate, which were to be feared considering their numbers were also great. And against his Estate, which were to be reached lands and inheritances, which had continued fo long in their races. But the King declared his owne intent by his Edict, the which he publi-

The King of Spaines Edict,

The King: For that reason doth in conscience binde a good and Christian government, to expell out of all Realmes and Common weales those things which breed scandall, and bring hurt to our good subjects, and danger to the Estate, but especially which are offensive to God, and prejudiciall to his service: for this cause experience having taught vs, That the residence of the new Christian Morisques, and their abode in the Realmes of Granado, Murcia, and Andelosia, hath beene the cause of all these inconveniences: for that besides the manner of H their proceedings, which joyned in the rebellion of Granado, the which began by cruell murthers of all the Priests and old Christians which lived amongst them, calling the Turks in to their aid; yet having drawne them out of the faid country, and fuffered them to liue in other Provinces, so as they would repent them of their faults, and live faithfully and Christian like, according to the precepts and just ordinances which were given them: They have not obferued and kept them according to the strict and direct rules of our Holy Faith : but haueal. waies made shew to contemne it, and to haue no feare to offend God; as hath beene seene by the great numbers which have beene punished by the Inquisition: and besides, they have committed many thefts and murthers against the old Christians. And not content herewith, they have conspired against my Royall Crowne and Realmes, seeking aid and succors from 1 the Turke, certaine interposed persons being sent to that effect, and doing the like with other Princes, promising vnto themselues aid and assistance, offering vnto them their persons and meanes. And seeing that during so many yeares, in which they have practised these treasons and conspiracies, not any one hath come to reueale them, but they have alwaies couered, conecaled, and denied them; it is a most apparant signe, that they have all beene of one minde and will against the service of God and of me, and against the good of this Realme; yet they might haue imitated many Knights of theirs, of generous extraction, who have don feruice to God, to the Kings our progenitors, and to vs, like good Christians, and most loyall vassals.

Wherefore confidering all this, and how much I am bound to fet downe fome good order. and to procure the preservation and increase of my Realmes and subjects, and desiring to prouide for all; I have decreed, with the aduice and counfell of many judicious learned men, and others, that are very religious, wife, and jealous of Gods service and mine, to chase our of the Realmes of Granado, Murcia, and Andelosia, and out of the towne of Hernache (althoughit be not within the limits of the faid Realmes) all the new Christians Morisques, both men, women, and children. For when as a great or detestable crime is committed in any Colledge or Communalty, it is fit that Colledge or Communalty should be ruined, and that the lesse with the greater, and one with another, should be punished. And that such as peruert the good and fincere life of Common weales, and of their townes and cities, should be banished from other inhabitants, lest their contagion infect them.

For this cause, by vertue of these presents, we ordaine and command, That all the new L Christians Morisques, without any exception of age or sex, of those that live and reside in the faid Realmes, and in the towne of Harnache, except such as be slaues, shall within the space of thirty daies after the publication hereof, depart out of all our Realmes and Dominions of Spaine, with their wives, children, servants, and others of their Nation: and that they shall not presume to returne or to make any residence in them, in any fort what soeuer. And we forbid them to depart by the Realmes of Valentia, or Aragon, nor to enter into them, nor to stay in any of our Realmes or Countries after the time prefixed, vpon paine of death, and confication of all their goods. And we command, that no person within our Realmes or Seigniories, of what estate, qualities, or condition soeuer, shall presume to receive, conceale, or defend publikely nor secretly any Morisque man or woman, after the said tearme, vpon paine to lose all M their goods, vassals, fores, and lands; and moreouer to lose all the graces, and benefits which they have from me, to be applied to my Exchequer.

And though I may justly confiscate all the goods moveable and vnmoueable of the faid Morifques, as belonging to traitours, and guilty of high treason; yet vsing clemency, I am content, that during the faid terme of thirty daies, they may dispose of their moueable goods. and carry them away, not in gold, filuer, jewels, nor letter of exchange, but in merchandife which is not prohibited, bought of the naturall subjects of this Realme, and not of others; or in the commodities of the faid country. And to the end they may during the time of thirty daies dispose thereof, and of their mooneable goods, and employ it in merchandise, or in the commodities of the country, and transport what they shall buy (for as for their lands, that must be annexed to my reuenues, to be employed in the service of God and the commonweale, as I shall thinke most sit) I declare by these Presents, that I take them into my royall protection, and affire them and their goods, That during the faid time they may go and come, to fell, exchange, and alienate all their mooneable goods, and to employ their mony, gold, filuer, and jewels, in merchandise not prohibited, or in the commodities of the country, and to transport the same freely, without any let or interruption, by land or by sea, paying vivall customes , so as they carry no gold or filter coyned, or to coyne, nor any other thing prohibited by the lawes of my Realme. Yet we are content, they shall carry so much money as shall be needfull for their passage by land, and embarking by sea: commanding all our officers and louing subjects to see this present Edict duely observed. &c. Signed, Tihe King.

After this publication of the Edict, the tearme of thirty daies was restrained to twenty so as the Morifques were haftened to depart; and the thips and veffels of what country focuer, were staied in all the Ports of Spaine, to transport them whither they would go. Many passed from Spaine into Barbary : but during this yeare there came about 150000 of these Moo risques into France, the King sending Commissaries, to see them well vsed, and orderly transported away.

There was a warre fallen out in Barbary betwirt Muley Xequy, King of Fez, and Muley Sidan warre in Brohis younger brother, both Mahometanes; in which warre the younger forced the elder to fly bary. his Country, and to come and craue aid from Philip King of Spaine: But the unfortunat loffe of Don Sebastian King of Portugall, was a good president for the Spaniard not to trust in barbarous Kings, without good affurance: He treated with the Barbarian, and promifed him fuccours, with an hundred thousand Duckats to returne to Alarache, (a place which held for him) where by money or other practifes, hee should draw vnto him as many souldiers as hee could: And that for the fafety of the fuccours that he should give him, hee should put Ala-D rache or Arrache into his hands. This Arrache is a strong towne in the Realme of Fez, in the Description of Province of Algar, feated vpon the Ocean, at the mouth of the River of Lucus, whereon part the towns of of it is built, and the other part vpon the Ocean : It hath a goodly Port, and hard to tak sfor Allante that it is defended by a Fort, in the which the Kings of Fez dovfinally entertaine a garrifon of three hundred light horse, and three hundred harquebusiers : for that the Portugals and Castilians hold in a manner all the Seatownes of the Provinces of Habat, and Erif, where they haue great garrifons. This Province is from the River of Nocoralong the Mediterranean Sea, unto the streight of Gibralter, the other is upon the Ocean from the said streight unto the river Lucus, in the which the King of Spaine holdeth at this day the strong townes of Tanger. Arzilla, and others. According to the former accord, the Barbarian returned to Arrache, with his mony in one of the King of Spaine his ships; to whom in a short time repaired many of his friends and feruants. The Spaniard in the meanetime having prepared a fleet of a great number of gallies and ships, and embarqued ten thousand souldiers therein, he gaue the command thereof vnto the Marquesse of S. Germaine, who arrived on the twentieth of November in the evening at the Port of Arrache, and thero rode at anchor all the night. The next day in the morning, the Marquesse called all the Captaines to a Councell, imparting vnto them his designe for to force Arrache, in case that the Moorlin King did not keepe his promise; they gaue him affurance, that they would carry themselves like vnto brave and valiant souldiers. But fee what happed: The King of Fez having no meanes to goe from his word, feeing the Spaniard so strong as he might well force it, many of his followers and people, scaring to fall vnder the power of Spaine, they would have abandoned him : but having the Governour of the castle at his denotion, he thrust out the garrison, and delivered the keies himselfe vnto the Marquesse of S. Germaine. Vpon the first bruit that the Spaniards were entred into the castle. all the inhabitants ran to armes, and thinking to relift them, after that many of them had SIIII 3 cndcd in Tartary.

Arrache where ended their daies valiantly, during three houres combat, they were forced to yeeld vnto the G Marquesse, who presently planted the crosse and armes of Castile vpon all the Towers and Steeples. Thus this strong towne which the Castilians and Portugals had so long desired, and wheras the inhabitants received a great ruine is in the end falne under the domination of their King. The newes of this exploit being brought into Spaine, pleased the King much, and the people made bone fires for joy: these are the alterations of times. The Moores in old time were wont to ouerrun Spaine, and now the Spaniards take their pleasure in Mauritania.

About the end of this yeare newes came to Constantinople, of the great warres which had been between the Vncle and the Nephew, by the death of the great. Cham of the Tartars the fon, who during his fathers life time, had continued at Constantinople as an hostage, and was now fent backe into his country by the Sultan achmus, thinking to enjoy his fathers effate; his H vucle, biother to the deceased Cham, practifed to seize vpon the crowne: but either of them a greats and having drawne an army of 60000 men together, in the end, they joyned battell, whereas after the flaughter of 40000 men vpon the place, the fonne had the victory, and by that meanes ob. tained the Crowne of Tartaria.

I will conclude this yeare 1610, with the relation of a particular businesse, to shew the greedy defire of the Turks to get by any vajust meanes what soeuer, and their infidelity and falfhod to fay and sweare any thing for bribes. Some yeares before, one Master Willoug bbit an English Gentleman, having rigged vp a ship forwar into the Lenant, he came into Algierin Batbary to fell his prize, where at that time one Solyman Catania was Baffa. This ship was fuddenly, feifed on, and rifled by the command of this Baffa, vpon noother fubje a, but that the Baffa pretended this ship had burnt a Caramoufall of his, which in truth the Baffa himselfe had caused to be fet on fire, that under colour thereof he might feife upon the ship and goods, Master Willoughby went to Constantinople, and there made his complaint to Sir Henry Liller, then Embassadour for the English; but yet could get no satisfaction; whereupon he returned into England, and obtained letters from his Majeftyno, the Grand Seignior, and to Sir Thomas Glover, then Embassador, residing at Constantinople which having received, he went presently to the Chimacham (who was Lieutenant to Murath Baffa the grand Visier, hee being then imploied in the wars against the Persian.) The Chimacham having read these letters, would not fuffer them to be deliuered to the Grand Seignior; promiting to doe justice vpon Solyman Catania, whom he discharged from his place, and sent for him to Constantinople; who being K come, and called in question, he denied the fact : Master Willoughby (having no certaine poofe of his losse) suborned one Ofish Bassa a Turke, who had beene at Mecha, and was therefore held a very holy man, who fer a brother of his to procure falle witnesses, vpon promise to have the tenth part of what should be recoursed; the witnesses being ready to sweare to his affertion, Solyman Catania hearing their Oath, compounded with Master Willoughby, and gauchim foure or fine thousand Dollars, so the businesse ended. Which shews the competion of the Turks, and that the holiest of them for many will not slinke to be are falle witnesse, and pike them chelling of Soals, I olderhauf davily

Jours died of the I lague.

A great lique This yeare 1611 the city of Confiantinople was wonderfully afflicted with the Plague, in Confiantino- the which dispersed to selfe ouer all, and grept into the Grand Seigniours Seraglio, whereas L one of his sonnes died of that infections whereupon the Grand Seigniour was forced together for his fafety, and so passe the remainder of the Summer in his palace or Seraglio of Mout Biff4, about a league and a halfe distant from the city ; this violent contagion did squagain Constantinople for the space of fine moneths, as there were numbered two hundred thousand persons dead within the time, and they did commonly carry surry day twelve or follows hundred bodies to be buried. The greatnesses of this prortality is nor to be imputed somuch to the corruption of the aire, as to the wilfull negligence of the Turks, who would not youth fafe to turne away from a body dead of this difeafe, whent it wento burially not to forheate The Turks of to visite their friends being insected. The obstinate beleefe they have of Predestination maketh them brutifhly contemne all forts of dangers: For fay they, as foone as man comes, out M of his mothers wombe to injoy the light of the world, God writes in his forchead all the good or cuill thall happen unto him, and particularly of what death he thall die, the necessity where of no humane power can avoid. A regard not any infection, but contrariwise when any one is dead, another takes his cloathes and weares them: which is the cause that Constantinople and the grand Cairc are seldome free; and when as the airc is any thing disposed to contagion, there dies such mustitudes of people, as they do not number them but by hundred thousands.

Before the beginning of this plague, the Baron of Salignac Embassadour for the French Deuth of the King at Constantinople, ended his Embassage with his life, His most Christian Majesty sent fadar at Conthe Baron of Mole, eldest sonne to the Baron of Sansie, to supply his place. He arrived at statings: Pera this yeare in the beginning of September, and about the end of October the Sultan being returned to Constantinople; after that he had visited the Muphti, (who is the chiefe of their Law) the Grand Visier, the Destorda, (who is the Sultans high Treasurer) the Bostangi Baffa his chiefe Gardiner, with other Great men of the Portwhich were highly in fauour, in the end he was admitted to audience, and to kiffe the Sultans hand. A ceremony which in mine opinion I owe ento the History, to the w that the Majesty of the Turkish Emperours is fo great, as to approch neere vnto them, the Embassadours, of forreine Princes are forced to disguise themselves, and seaving the habits of their nation, to attire themselves and their Traine after the Turkish manner. Thus the Embassador of France parted from his Lodging at Pera, wearing vpon his Frenchapparel a long Turkith Robe of cloath of gold curled, furred with Sables: his Gentlemen and Secretaries to the number of fixteene had the like Robes, but of meaner stuffe, weating caps of blacke Veluct : he had twenty servants in long cassocks of Skarlet, called in Turkish, Ferrages, and vpon them long Robes of the same stuffe, with caps of Taffata; the foure Dragomans or the Kings Interpreters, the Captaines, Masters of Ships, and other Frenchmen attyred all in long Robes, accompanied the Traine. He past the channell which doth separate Pera from Constantinople: being come to the other side, he found many goodly horses for him and his Traine, which some Turkes that were friends to France, had fent him to conduct him to the. City; at the gate whereof many Chiaus and Isnizaries attended him to conduct him to the Seraglio: two Chiaus Baffaes went of either fide him, accompanying him thither, the rest of the Turks going before. His arrivall was no lesse honourable at the Palace Royall, than his comming to the Towne: Two Capigi Baffaes, or chiefe of the Porters, received him at the entry of a great Court, and conducted him to the Grand Visier, who attended him at dinner in the hal, where he was feasted, being accompanied D only with one Dragoman or Interpreter: the rest of his Traine w re conducted into a low gallery, whereas dinner was prepared for them after the Turkish manner: That is to say, a great Tapestry vpon the ground without cloath or napkins, and some dishes thinne set. The meat was water gruell with fugar, and some pottage with pullets: there were two men either of them holding a certain instrument of sodden leather, in which there was a benerage which they call Comet, made of the juyce of Lymmons, water, and fugar, and withall they held a cup of blancht copper, gitting to cuery one drinke, and going among the diffies to ferue them more commodioufly. From this feaft, distastefull to them that had lived after the French fashion, they past into another gallery, whereas the Embassadour and sixteene of his company received each of them a Robe of Tinfell, the which having put on vpon their other, E they were conducted through a little court paued with marble, towards the Grand Seigniours chamber, which was enricht on the one fide with many pillars of marble, and fquare stones of the same stuffe, and beautissed with two little sountaines on either side : The Cham-The Switans ber within was about ten paces square, the planchard was gilt, the wals enameled with Houres Chamber. after the Turkish manner, and the floore coursed with Tapestry of gold and silke. At the corry of this Imperiall chamber flood fix Capigi or Porters, whereof two of them tooke the Embassador under the armes, and led him to kisse the Sultans hand, or rather his Robe; for having faluted him from the greatest of Christian Kings, hee kist but his Robe, and then was led on the one fide, going backewards, to the end he fhould not turne his backe to the Empetow. The Erench Geneleusen were conducted after the like manner to kiffe his Robe. But they could hardly fee the Sultan, for his face was turned rowards a window that was grated before the which, during the ceremony there past thirty Capigi, every one carrying a piece of the Presents which the Embassador had brought: during the which, the Frenchmen could not fee him but on the other fide. This faluration being ended, the Embassador made a short

Troubles in Tranfyluania.

This past at Constantinople, wheras the Sultan did willingly see an Embassador his Ally, whom he honoured aboue all others. But in Transylvania the affaires went after another fraine; the combustions which seemed inseparable to this miserable Province, made it fill the Theater of all disorders. Gabriel Battori, who governed it fince the succession of Ragoizi, had put himselse into the Turks protection, against King Matthias, who pretended a title, by reason of the Session made by Prince Sigismund vnto the Emperour, as King of Hungary, and had recovered Hermstad, and chased Raduille Vayuod of Valachia out of his countrey; where bauing settled a new Gouernour, and filled the garrifons with Haiduckes, he returned toward Transylvania, to oppose himselse against Fortgatsie King Matthias his Licutenant, who came H with troups out of high Hungary, and past the river of Tibisce. The Vayuod Radnille had tetyred himselfe into Moldania to Prince Constantine, whom he gaue to understand, That Battoly had an intent to seise vpon his country, and to make but one Monarchy of their three Prouinces: whereupon they joyned their forces together, and in the end of Iune entered into Valachia, from whence they expelled Battori his Lieutenant with all the garrisons. This exploit made them to hope of a continuance in the prosperity of their armes, they entered into Tranfyluania, whereas they purfued Batteri with fuch dilligence, as they forced him to come to a battell neere unto Cromstat, the which he lost with part of his troups, being constrained to faue himselse with his horsemen in Hermstad, whereas some of the chiese inhabitants seeing him receive this difgrace, attempted to submit themselves vnder the obedience of King Mat. 1 this: but the practife being discouered by him, hee did such execution, as hee purchased to himselfe the name of Cruell.

In the meane time Fortgatste Lieutenant to King Matihias, maketh vse of this deseato feise voon Transyluania : hee made an Accord with Andrew Mage (who had drawnehigh Hungary into rebellion, and caused the Haiduckes to reuolt) so as being freed from that feare, hee entered into Transylvania; where having taken some Townes and Castles, heelay, ed siege to Clausenburg, the which he battered so suriously, as the garrisons and inhabitants feeing themselves ready to bee forced, yeelded, and tooke the Oath of Allegiance to King Matthias the fine and twentieth of Iuly. But as these prosperities of Fortgatsie were humane, fo did they not long continue. Battori being thut vp in Hermstad, conjures all his friends to K come vnto him, and entreated the Baffacs of Buda and Temesware to succour him, according to the commandement which they had received from the Grand Seigniour: hee practifed with Nage (a man which did (wimme continually in the floats of inconfiancy) and makes him to revolt againe in high Hungary, vpon a surmise, That Fortgassie had not kept promise with him; fo as Nage tooke armes againe, seised upon the fort of Bayens, and filled all high Hullgary with combustions; so as Fortgatsie could expect no succours at his need from thence: then having received some forces from the Turks and Tartarians, he went to field, pursuing Fortgatsse with such heat and sury, as he forced him to abandonals that he had taken in Transsylvania, and to retyre into Valachia. What desolation did this warre bring vinto these Prouinces by fo many prifes and reprifes a Battori going with a thouland horse to surprise Total, L vpon the frontiers of Valachia, whereas they then held a great faire, he found the garrifon fo watchfull vpon their guard, as having loft part of his horfemen, he was forced to returne into Transyluania.

Fortgathe bà

On the other side, Fortgatste with his Hungarians, thinking from Valachieto recover high Hungary by the Countrey of the Zeclerians, could not effect his defigne: for Batteribeing advertised thereof, stopped his passage; and in like manner the Barles of Bucheime and Dam pier had passed the river of Tibisce to meet him: so as Batteri set such guards in all the passes ges and fireights, that Fortgatsie was forced to retyre towards Polonia by the Reep mountains, and defart places, wheras his army was fo oppress with familie and all other necessities, as the perished miserably, there remaining few aline; with the which he ended his passage into Po. M lonia, and from thence soone after hee returned into Hungary, but with a very poore Equi-

Thus the storme ceasing in Transylvania by the restraint of Portgatsie, a more violent

A tempest riseth in Moldauia, to the end that these vnfortunate Regions should neuer be with- Troubles in out fome touch of mifery : for the Turke having vnderstood, That Conflantine Prince of that Meldania. country had relieued the Valachian against Battori his allye, or rather his Tributary, he sends a new Prince into Moldauia, the supposed some of one Thomas, or Auron as some write, who had in former time commanded there, and with him fifteene hundred fouldiers, with Letters of command to the Turks and Tartarians thereabouts, to affift him with their forces. This new Prince was sometime in France, and afterwards detained prisoner in the Fort of Lagues in Spaine, within the Pyrenean mountaines. Thus two Princes contend for Moldauia, the one supported by the Polonian, and the other by the Turke. But behold, a third Prince commeth in and pretends a title, being fonne to one Ianicolo who had commanded there. This B man had beene a prisoner in the blacke tower at Constantinople, to which he was committed by the Sultan Amurath, for that he had loft a battell in the yeare 1601, against Michael, who then possess Moldauia; who escaping from thence, wandred through divers countries; and at last comming into England, his Majesty of Great Brittaine pittying his miserable estate, recommended him by his Letters to Sir Thomas Glouer his Majesties Embassador, then residing at Constantinople, with commandement to assist him, and to solicite his restitution with the Grand Seigniour. Vpon the receipt of which Letters, he retyred this wandering Prince into his house at Pera, where he entertained him, with many of his friends and followers which repaired vnto him, for a long time; and in the meane time he folicited the Grand Seigniour for his restitution, having good accesse vnto him, by reason that he spake the Tur-C kish tongue perfectly, and needed no Dragoman, or Interpreter. To whom the Sultan still gaue good answers, but with delaies, that it was not yet time; but he should have satisfaction. His Competitor (who was in possession of Moldania) hearing of this practise, made friends at the Great Turks Court, and corrupted fome of the Baffaes by bribes, (they being all by nature very couetous) to the end they might crosse his designe, and make him away if it were possible : and among the rest he had won Murath Bassathe grand Visier, a man of great power and authority, who practifed many means to get the Moldauian into his hands. First, he sent word vnto the Embaffadour, That the Sultan having a meaning to reflore him, defired to fee the man, if he were capable of the place or no: but being aduertifed of their intent, and well acquainted with their practifes, he refused to send him. After which, he wrote voto him, That D it was the Grand Seigniors pleasure he should send the Moldauian vnto him, that he might confer with him. To whom the Embassador made answer, That vnlesse he might see a Warrant under the Grand Seigniors own hand, he would not deliuer him. Murath Baffa feeing that none of these practises could prenaile, resolved to setch him out by force. For the effecting whereof he drew together two thousand Ianizaries. The Embassadour hearing of his intent. fortified his house, and armed his people with the Moldanians which were with their Prince, meaning to stand vpon his defence. Murath Baffa desirous to know what the Embassador did in his Lodging, difguifed a lanizary like vnto a Greekish Sheepheard; who entering into the Embassadors house, found them all in armes: then returning vnto the Bassa, he told him that he had to do with a mad man, and if he proceeded in his enterprise, he would hazard the E losse of many Ianizaries: whereupon he gaue it ouer. After which, the Embassador being called home into England, the Moldanian despairing of restitution from the Turkish Sultan, he turned Turke; and being presented to the Grand Seignior, was made Bey of Butsia in Asia: the which he enjoyed not long; for Nasfuf comming from the Persian wars, discharged him. Thus Moldauia having many pretented Soucreignes, suffered many miseries, and was a prey to Turke, Tartarians, and Polonians, all partifans to these Sourcignes. These were the troubles which the Turks caused at land for the ruine of the Christians But behold what he suffered at sea by the gallies of Florence, Malta, and Naples; the Florentines the voinge of made their enterprise apart. The Great Duke of Tuscany being aduertised, That the Cara-the Gallont uan which reas correct the cribuse of Asympto Consequences are presented to pure the consequences of Asympto Consequences are presented to pure the consequences of Asympto Consequences of the consequences of uan which transported the tribute of Ægypt to Constantinople, prepared to put to sea. he re against the F folued to divert this tribute, and by the valour of his armes to bring it to Ligorne: and for the Tarks.

effecting hereof, he speedily armed source gallions, under the command of Beauregarda Frenchman, who was Admirall. The first was called the new gallion, in which the faid Admirall went: the second, the great Ligorne, commanded by Brandequedor, Generall at land, and allied to the Duke; and the other two were commanded by two French Captaines. Beauregardha. G uing received commandement, to passe with this sleet into the Leuant, to meet with the Ca. rauan, he benthis course towards Candy, a fertile Island inhabited by the Gracians: Being arrived in the Port of Califmene to water, he continued there fix daies. Leaving this Island he failed towards Cyprus, which is held by the Turks, and so coasting Siria, they learned of a thip of Marseilles, that the Carauan was yet in the Port of Alexandria, where they prepared for their voyage to Constantinople. To attend them the Admirall Beauregard went and cast anchor at the fort of Sidon, called Sarepta, gouerned by Emir, or Armil Facardin, a Rebell to the Turke, and a great friend to the Florentines, where he staied twelue daies, to take in Bisker. fleth, and other necessary refreshings. And having made a more strickt league of friendship with Facar din, he honoured him with a coffer full of arms, wherby the Florentines thips came H as freely into those parts, as into their owne country.

Beauregard having well victualled and munitioned his gallions, hee returned towards the Isle of Cyprus, wheras he found a Christians ship called the flying Dragon, which came from Damietta, by whom he was affured that the Turks army, confishing of a great number of gal. lies, was gone out of the Port of Rhodes, and had taken a Flemish ship. These newes made The Florentines him thinke that he should meet the fleet, and that he must of force defend himselfe. Where, meet with the fore he made all things ready, and prescribed the order which his Captaines should hold during the fight; caufing his ordnance to be mounted as if they were to joyne. He had foure as good gallions, and as well furnished, as any were in the Leuant seas, either of them being armed with 40 pieces of ordnance, and 400 good fouldiers. Betwixt the Island of Cyprus and Caramania they encountered this Turkish fleet, consisting of forty gallies and two galliasses. under the command of Baffa Mustapha Grego, who was Generall of this fleet, which was in fight of the Florentines ships: the galliasses advance to take view of them, and to find how far their cannon would reach; and in the meane time the gallies put themselves into the some of a Croifant, ready for the combat. Beauregard an old sea Captaine, and well practifed in sea fights, would not make a fhot against the gallies, but attended untill the whole sleet came clo'c vp to him, which being necre, he faluted them fo furioufly with his cannon, giving them the broad fides, as the Turks (who expected no fuch reception) were all amazed, and making a stand, would proceed no further. Their Generall having well observed the resolute counter. nance of the Florentines, divided his gallies into two foundrons; giving charge to the one to K give an affault to the Florentines gallions; and in the mean time the rest should prepare them-felues to fight.

Being thus divided, they came one after another to the affault, the which continued for the space of fix houres, and yet could not boord them; Mustapha seeing five of his gallies sunkely the enemies cannon, with the loffe of all the men that were within them. But suddenly the wind changed, and proued fauorable to the Florentines, who embraced this aduantage, giving chase to the Turks gallies, forcing them to seeke their safety in the hauen of Famagusta, the The Turkiput chiefe fort of Cyprus; foof affailants (being beaten) they became run-awaies: fo inconfiant are the accidents of war; and especially at sea, whereas the good or bad successe many times dependeth of a little winde.

This Turkith fleet, having loft five gallies, and recovered a Port in Cyprus, the Admirall take arich this Recurregard locing his designe against the Caravan disappointed, he resolved to return towards Ligorne with his gallions : being at sea, he encountred a Turkish vesselled a Caramousall, which came from Rhodes, to goe vnto Cyprus: they chased it, and in the end ouertooke it; which they proft so with their ordnance, as they slew 130 Turks, and tooke 300 slaues. The booty was very rich, being valued at 140000 crownes. After this prize, their victuals beginning to faile, having beene so long at sea, they bent their course for Ligorne: but the winde falling contrary, they were forced to stay eight daies in the Island of Scarpante, past thebar of Messina, and having given chase to certaine gallies of Tunes, they arrived at Ligornethe fisteenth of Iune, where there was great joy for their returne, and the prize which they had M brought, the which according to the custome was to be divided; one third to the soldiers and mariners, and the other two parts imploied for the entertainment of the ships, and the pair ment of the Captaines. This

This Carauan which goes from Agypt to Constantinople, is every yeare attended for, not only by the gallions and gallies of Florence, but by those of Malta and Naples, and by all the Pyrats of the Mediterranean sea: like vnto the English and Hollanders, who yearely lay in wait for the Indian fleet before the conclusion of the peace and truce with the Spaniards, And although their principall designe was to take some part of the Carauan, yet they had other enterprises upon the Turks Countrey, besides the spoile of merchants which they met by chance, which many times payed the charge of their voiage; and somtimes, they that thought to take were taken and lost both their ships and lives.

The gallies of Malta, commanded by the Bailife of Venouge, and those of Naples by the Marquis of Saint Croix, joyned together foone after, with a defigne to fet vpon the Carauan B which carried the revenue and tribute of Ægypt to Constantinople, or els to put in execution the enterprise which they had long before projected, vpon certaine places of Albania, or to surprise or spoile some Island in the Archipelague which might pay their charges. But the first failing, they met with a Venetian ship laden with merchandife, to the value of 100000 crownes. The Spaniards who commanded in the gallies of Naples feifed upon this ship, but the G. nerall of Malta would by no meanes confent vnto it, nor suffer any of the merchandise to be put into his gallies, for that he would not vnjustly violate the friendship which was betwixt his Order and the State of Venice. This example did touch the Spaniards consciences. so as within few daies they sent away the Venetian ship, but in courtesse they had vnloden all the merchandise.

After this prey of a Christian ship, the fleet discouered two sailes at sea, sending presently the christians after them, they were two barks, the one comming from Candy loaden with wood, and the sallings to the other from Scarpance charged with wine, the which being brought vnto the Generals, gaue Isand of Lange. them to viderstand, that the Carauan of Ægypt was not yet past, being aduertised that fifty Christians gallies attended them in their passage. Vpon this adulce, the Christian Generals being out of hope to surprise the Carauan, presently resoluted to vidertake a more great and glorious enterprise, and to surprise the Island and eastle of Lango in the Archipelague, vpon the coast of Natolia, and about seven of the clocke at night they set saile with a good winde. but being changed in the morning, they were forced to return to the Island of Porcherne: from whence they parted againe at eight or the clocke at night, and continuing their course, in the D morning they discouered three Florentine ships, who told them, that they had entred into the Isle of Nigropont with seven gallies; but having beene discovered, they could not effect any thing; and that their gallies were separated from them in the chase of source galliets. The Christian fleet continuing their course, they arrived about eleven of the clock in the morning at S. lean de Sernaë, where having cast anchor, there was a Councell called in the Admirall: where they resolved to petard the castile of Lango, toward the sea : for the execution whereof they should land 200 men; viz. thirty Knights and fifty souldiers out of the gallies of Malta, and 120 Spaniards out of the gallies of Naples, and that they should carry two petards with them, the one given in charge to Captain Beaulaigue in the troupe of them of Malta and the other was conducted by the Spaniards; the rest of their men which they should land, E should go and assault the towne of Lango. With this resolution they parted from S. Jean de Seruae, with a good winde, and arrived at the Island of Lango on the fixt of lune, an houre afjer midnight, whereas they landed three miles from the towne: they that were appointed for the enterprise, marche on with their petards, according to direction, but the night being very darke, the troupe of Malta straied from their guide, but their valour brought them directly to the walls of the Towne; where after many turnings and windings to finde a fit place to plant the petard, (notwithstanding they were discovered and much shot at) Beaulaigue set it to a Port next the sea well flanckt with the Castle, the which he forced, and his men ente- Lange forced by ting with fury, went from fireet to fireet, and put all to the fword that made refiftance. the Christiani. The Spanishes on the other fide made another breach with their petard, and entered the F Towne; notwithstanding that at their first approch, the Turks (having discouered them) played upon them with their great ordnance and small shot. The troups being joyned together, having cut all the Turks in pieces they met with, they came to the place before the Ca-

file, which they thought to surprise: but the bridge was drawne, and they lay open at the mercy of their shot; so as there were fifteene Knights of Malta hurt, one staine, with a Spanish

Captaine, and some six and thirty souldiers of the gallies of Naples, and as many wounded. G Day being come, the Bailife of Venouge Generall of the gallies of Malta, came vnto the town with the foreward, wherein were 250 Knights, and 450 fouldiers : the Marquis of S. Croix followed him with the two fonnes of the Viceroy of Naples; and 1500 Spaniards, who fooi. led the towne and fuburbs, and tooke all that were living captine : but the Caftle being well fortified they found it impossible to force; whereupon embarking their men and spoile, they resoluted in their return to Malta and Naples, to make an enterprise vpon some towns of Alba. nia: but vpon the way they were aduertifed, That the Turks had discouered the intelligence which the Spaniards and Knights of Malta had with the Grecians of the country; whereuron they tooke reuenge vpon them, putting many of them to death, and among it others a Patriarch, who being accused to have practifed the Christians revolt against the Turks, was cruel. H ly fleied aliue, and his skin fent to Constantinople. So dangerous a thing it is to feeke for liberty with this Mahometane nation.

The Carauan of Ægypt was still in the port of Alexandria attending a passage, and tobe freed from fo many Christian gallies which lay in wait for it; and it staied the longer by reafon of the great plague wherewith Constantinople was afflicted. But in the end of October. Mechmet Bassa of Caire (who would conduct it in person) having a convoy of fifty gallies well The Carauan of armed, put to sea, and arrived at Constantinople without any encounter. At his landing this Daffa caused to march before him 60 mules, every one laden with 20000 sequins in kind, be ing a whole yeares tribute of the Kingdome of Ægypt, the which he caused to be carried to the Sultans Serail. This mony was welcome to the Port: for the former wars both in Hunga. 1 ry, Transyluania, in Asia against the Rebels, and in Persia, had so wasted the Emperours trea. fure, as it would hardly entertaine one of his armies. The Balla who had gathered this tribute toge ther faithfully and with great diligence, was at his comming to the Sultans Port honored with the charge of Bassa of the sea, (he who had it before, being advanced to the dignity of Visier) and moreover the Sultan promised him his daughter in marriage, being but three veres

Newes came to the Port, that certaine thips, gallies, and galliaffes of the Christians, to the number of fifty, came neere vnto the Hellespont; which put the Turks in great fearer and complaints being brought vitto the grand Scignior, That certain Caramonfals had bin taken by the Chiltian gallies he fent prefently for the captain Baffa or Admirall of the fea deman. K ding of him, Whether the report of these losses were true or no? To whom he answered, Yes. Why are not you then at fea, faith he? He answered, For that I can get neither men nor money. Whereupon the Deftardar or Treasurer was sent for who had lost his head, had so the Aga of the Grand Scigniors women entreated for him.

This Summer Constantinople and the Countries thereabouts was so plagued with such Grafibopers at Confinition clouds of grafilehoppers, as they did shadow the very. Sunne beames, and fell youn the City and country round about. The Turks confulted with their Wife men, what it might portend: Who answered, That they did foreshew great plenty to follow, But indeed they left not a greene hearbe nor a leafe in all the Countrey adjoyning, nor in the city, where they catered into their very chambers, and annoyed them much, beeing almost as big as domice, I with red wings. And soone after there fell such extraordinary great haile in Constantinople and Gallata, with such abundance of raine, as the violence of the water did suddenly shut up one of the gates of the city, and fo rebounding filled their thops and houses, that very many were in great danger of drowning. Some houles fell downe, and some people were flaine; the pauements of the freets were torne up, and the flones carried together into great we have formerly made relation of the Perfians victories; and of the defect and desth of Cicala Generall of the Turks army, in the yeare 1605 ... And that the year following the Sophy having recovered what foeuer the Turks had taken from his Predecessors had exerded the bounds of the Empire vnto the blacke sea, from whence he sent an Empassadou vn M to the Grand Seignior, to let him understand, that having recovered what had been spully viurped from him, he would proceed no further, but defired to line in peace; the which might now be the better affured, the one holding nothing from the other, Moreoust, this Perian Embassadour having remained seven moner has at the Sultana Port, was in the end forced to retire into Persia without audience. And lastly, That Amurath Serder the grand Visier was afterwards forced to conuert his arms against Gambolas and the rebels of Asia, and to negle &

Notwithstanding the Persian war, there arrived this yeare at Constantinople an Embassa- 16 Lia dor from Persia, who according to the Turks maner was attended on by a great troup of Cha- A Persian Email oux on horsebacke, Capigies, lanizaries, and other Captaines, sent by the Sultan to conduct biffider comes him to his lodging. Within few daies after his arrival, there was a great thew made in Con-ple. stantinople by the seuerall trades of the city, every one marching by themselves before the grand Seigniors Serail, and reprefenting vnto him their maner of marching in the warres, and the order of their provision, some carying on their shoulders sheep, others lambs, calues, beef. R &c. All which was don in policie, to daunt and dishearten the Persian Embassadour, and to encourage their own people; and withall to let him know, that there should be as great plentv in their campes, as he saw at that present. And to abuse him still with the imagination of their great preparation, the Chimacham or Visiers Lieutenant sent the next day for this Persian Embassador, and during their conference had taken order, that the Emperor of Tartaries brother (who was then in the Sultans Court) should come in : at whose entrance the Chimacham arole from his place, faying, O, I know for what you are come, it is for mony for your foldiers: you shall receive it at such a place. Which words were heard by a Dragoman to the English Embasfador, then present: which was don to terrifie the Persian Embassador; and the same time and to the like end they fent ouer divers troups of foldiers to Scudaret, as if they had been ready c to march with an army.

The Turks great armies are not railed in hast, neither do they march in post; when as the Spahi, which make the greatest part of his army, and have no other pay or entertainment than the reuenues of certain land, are discharged, they must have a whole year to recover their reuenue, and to put themselves in equipage, and moreover, it is threescore daies march for an army, from Constantinople into Persia.

Also in the years 1609 and 1610, the Turks had not attempted any thing against the Perfian, who stil solicited him for peace. The greatnes of the Othoman empire could not resoluc to make a peace, having received fo great defeats; they would give it but as victors, not as vanquished. But this year Achmat resolued to send a puissant Army of about 150000 men, D against this antient enemy of his House, under the command of Amurath Serder his grand Vificribut before the army entered into Persia, it was without a commander, by the death of Ser. der, in the end of July fo as they were forced to stay and attend the Sultans pleasure from

It was suspected he was possoned by Massas, one that stood out in rebellion against the grand Seignior, and yet he had many friends in the Turks army. Wherfore to preuent all mutinies, and consequently the ouerthrow of the whole army, Amurath Bassa in his sicknesse adulted the grand Seignier (by letters which he fent vnto him) to make Nolluf Generall of the whole army, and fo by faire meanes to draw him home, and then to dispose of him at his pleasure. The Sultan with the great Bassa's at Court approved well of this advice, and chose E him grand Visier, and General of the Army. Who having received the Seal and authority. did forthwith put many of Amurath's friends to death, and with their mony paid all the fouldiers, which wanted pay, whereof some had beene without five yeares before. Hee also fent unto the Grand Seignior threescore and ten mules loden with money of Amurath his Treasure, and threescore with goods; all which the Sultan gaue to Amurath his Wife and children.

It is strange to reade how the Grand Seignior doth tyrannife ouer his subjects, and how feuerely he doth punish the least omission in any of his officers: for I find it observed, that the feuenth of Ianuary in the end of this year 1611, the grand Seignior being abroad in the fnow. and not wel provided for of fuel, he caused Stambel Aga who had that charge, to be ftript na stutity of the F ked, and fet in the snow four or flue hours. Indeed this winter was very rigorous, and there fel Saliani aboundance of flow throughout all Turky, with great stormes : many houses were beaten downe; and among stothers, the French Consultof Aleppo was slain with the fall of his own

Nulluf marching with his army to the frontiers of Persia, committed such spoils, as the So- G phy was constrained to draw all his forces together to preuent the ruine of his country, being then about the midst of August. But when they were come to a battell, the Persian finding himselfe too weak for him, offred conditions of peace, and promised to give the Turk a quantitie of filk which should make the charge of 200 camels, for a yearly tribute, in acknowledgment of some Countries which he had conquered from the Othomans. These offers were accepted at Constantinople: but there was added, That the Persians son should be called Bassa of Tauris; and that the Magistrat or Judge of that city, called the Cady, should be sent from Constantinople. We shall see in the following year the effects of these propositions, by the Embassador of Persia, whom Nasaf shall bring to Constantinople: in the meane time let vs return to the Mediterranian sea, take a survey of the valiant exploits of the Knights of H Maltaagainst the Turks.

On the 26 of April, a Turk having lent a good fum of mony to a Christian, to be paid at a certain day, he came before the appointed day with another Turk, and willed the Christian to pay the mony to that other Turk when the day came. Which the Christian promised to doe, and performed it accordingly; but the Turk denied the receit therof: wherupon he towhom the mony was properly due came and demanded it. To whom the Christian answered, That he had paid it to that party towhom he had affigned it. Wherunto the Turk replied, That if it were so he were satisfied; but yet the other Turk denied it. Wherupon the matter was examined before the ludge, and the Turk who had received the mony, taking an oath to the contrary, the Christian according to the Turkish justice was inforced to pay the mony againsthe I which he did but withal prayd God to shew some publique signe which of them had don the wrong. And therupon the Turk going forth to repair home to his own house, sel downe dead in the street.

The Great Master Vignancourt continuing his generous designes against the Turke, had an enterprise against Navarrin, a place importing this common enemy of Christians: for execution wherof he fent the fine gallies of his Order under the charge of Vaqueras, great commander of the Order, and chief of the nation of Prouence. They came within some miles of the thore, but found their landing very difficult, for that they had bin discouered by one of the cast les of Navarrin, which had given the alarm vnto the whole country, so as they were forced to passe on to some more easie conquest, to the end their voyage might not proue vnprofita. g ble:wherfore they failed into the Archipelague, and came neere to the coast of Morea, tenne legues from Corinth, where in the night they landed 800 men under the conduct of the commander Cremeaux General at land. This troup marched towards Corinth, and an house before corine facted day were at the town gates to force them. Some of the Turks took armes, but their weakerestby the Knights stance could not stay the Knights from entring with their troups: they sackt the town, and hauing taken what spoile was portable, they caried away with them 500 slaues. After this triumph, the Christians made a happy retreit, & in good order, not with standing al the attempts of the Turks horse and foot, who were drawn together in great numbers, making 10000 souldiers, for the country is very populous; in view of whom they imbarqued their spoil & slaues. Herby it appears, that this was one of the most desperatent erprises that hath bin of long time L feen. For to attempt a place fo far from their retreit, in fo populous a country, which vpon the least alarm may draw together so strong a power; and to make their retreit with so small a number, against such great troups as pursued them : doubtleffe wee must confesse, that as they shewed great valor, & had good fortune, so they undertook a very dangerous enterprise. Thus the Knights of Malta vanquished; whom we might tearm the masters of the Mediterranean fea, if the revenues of their Order would fuffer them to fer forth shipping and forces equal to their valor.

But to follow the variable course of the history, let vs observe the different occupations of Christians. At Prague the Germanes entertained themselves with the consideration of a Crowne, which appeared in the firmament over that City about the middest of the moneth M October, giving a very great light; and about it Armies of men fighting, as if it were who should have it. At that time the Emperour Rodulphus was voon the West, or declining of his dayes; and Matthias who succeeded him in the Empire, then King of Hungary, was up

A of the fun tiling of his triumphs. Many expounded this heavenly apparition as a prefage of happinesse and good fortune to Mathias; he enloyed the crowne of Hungary already, and by defignation that of Bohemia; and now they did prognosticate vnto him that of the Romans, Doubtlesse men which aspire after great fortunes do rather adore the Sunne rising than segting; and mans life when it declines saftes of the lees. The flourishing glory of Mauthias his age, and his actions in the Warres, did adde nothing to the authoritie of other men in the country, but did mightily settle his owne. Three Sunnes which were seene in the firmament oner Victora the chiefe city in Austria, confirmed the Germans more in this their hope, that he should have the third Crowne of the Romans. This last apparition hapned the years fol-

About the end of the yeare, some of the English Embassadours men entring into quarrell with certain lamoglans of the next Serail, from words they fell to blowes. During which tumultone of the embaffadors men threw a stone, and smote a Iamoglan on the forehead, where of he died within few hours after. The Aga of the Serail complained herof vnto the Visier. who presently sent the Subbassa of Galata to make inquiry of the fact. The Embassador went himselse to the Serail, and sent for his men which had bin in the quarrell, willing the Turks to designe the party which had thrown the stone. Who all with a shout ran upon one Simon Dibbins, a man that was newly come from Candy, where he had serued in the Venetian garrisons, and was now entertained into the Embassadors service. This Simon was not he that threw the stone; notwithstanding the Turks would none but him, on him they laid hands and dragged him away. The Embassador interposing himselfe, and offering to pledge for him, was thrust away by them, his men beaten, and one of his pages wounded. Wherupon he complained to the grand Visier, but prevailed little; for to prison they dragged this Simon, and there kept him a whole month, neither could he be released, albeit the English nation offered great sums to ransom his life; for the Turkes would needs have bloud for bloud. The day of execution being appointed, the Embassador sent his Chapleine to the prison where this Simon was, to prepare him for death: vnto whom (examining him how he had formerly lived) he confessed. that in England some few years before he had killed a man; for which fact he fled thence into Candy; from whence he came to Constantinople, where he was to suffer for that which hee did not: the luft judgement of God pursuing him to the shedding of his bloud in Constan-D tinople among the Turks undeferuedly, for the bloud which he shed in England wilfully. He was hanged at the Embassadors gates: his head and heels the next night were stoln away by the Turks, as it was thought, to vie in some kind of Sorcery; the other parts of his body they had leaue to take down and bury.

This year 1612, they did celebrate at Constantinople a double nuptial feast; for the mari- 1612. ages of the Bassa Mehemet, sonne to the deceased Cicala, with the Sultans sister; and the Bassa Mechmet Admirall at sea, he whom we have seen lately return from Egypt, and bring to Constantinople the revenues of that rich kingdom, with the eldest daughter of his Emperor. For the feasts of yong Cicala the Spahi made courses on horseback with battle-axes and barres, in the open place neer vnto the Serail; where they made divers fire-works of very great charge. but of finall invention; and they gave presents to aboue 20000 persons, besides the charge of the banqueting stuffe, which amounted to aboue 20000 crowns. The pomp was double: for the Sultans women celebrated that day with the greatest ladies of the Port; & the men apart in other places did celebrate it in like manner. But the magnificence of the marriage of the Bassa Admiral at sea with Achmais eldest daughter had far more lustre at the port. The ceremonie was performed the 30 of Iune, twenty daies after the other; and the order of this great pomp, as well as some other which we have described in this history, requireth a particular relation.

The day before the confurmation of the marriage, they fent the brides moveables and lewels, from the Serail to the bridegroomes lodging, in this order and state following. First, there marched fine hundred Ianizaries on foot, beeing followed with the grand Prouoft of Constantinople, and the general Surveyor, both on horsebacke, and attyred in cloth of gold; the Aga or Colonel of the Ianizaries very proudly adorned, and inuironed with some Ianizaries, marched alone on horsebacke: after these, two hundred men of qualitie well mounted. and richly attyred, followed with a flow pace. The last which marcht in this pompe or cere-Ttttt 2

monie, were the Talismans, Centons, Emiss, and other ministers of an elementary. And & presently after followed the Bassa Ashmat, Dastarda on Treasurer, who denducted the mount bles, as chosen by the Sultan robe Godfather or Sagois crotthe Bride, beeing innirened with twelve footmen attyred in long tobes of gold. After him followed the mountaines apparell and jewels, which made the brides truffe having in the head excellent musicke after the Tue kish maner, of hoboies and kettle drums on horseback, some /v other events and has

These moueables consisted of 27 presents; the first was a little hat all of gold countries with pretions stones, and pantosses or womens shooes after the Turkin fashion of pure seld, inc. ched with Turquoifes and Rubies; a booke of Mahomets, Law, the cones, where the gold all fet with diamonds; many bracelets and other rare deuties for women of pure gold with many pretious stones a little coffer acubit long and halfe as broad, all of roble chrystal, H having the corners of gold, in which were to be feen great diamonds and huge peatles, to the value of 80000 pounds sterling. After this pretious coster were carried many imposts imbrois dred with gold and pearle, and head bands for the forhead, with many robes of clothof gold. All this was distributed into 27 presents, as we said, and caried with great pompe by 27 men

After these presents followed xx Caroches full of yong maidens, saues to serve the brides these Caroches were couered and shut, and either of them attended by two eunucha Moores After these followed 28 virgins slaves, attyred in cloth of gold, and accompanied by 28 black Eunuchs, al on horseback and richly clad. After which were seen 240 mules loden with tents of tapefly, cloath of gold, fattin, veluet, with the ground of gold, with many cufhions which i are the chairs the Ladies of Turky vie; with many other rich and sumptyous mouables, Such was the truffe which this yong princeffe brought to her spoules boule. Doubtleffe this couls page was stately, and did wel become the pompe and greatnes of the Othoman house, from the which the descended, the mightiest and richest of all the royal houses of Europa, yea of the whole world.

Achmat bu daughter roy-

The mariage day being come, the bride was conducted to her husbands lodging with no leffe pomp and flate than her inqueables. The Ianizaries marched firft, as they had formerly don, being followed by the grand Prouost, the Surueyor their Aga, and many other Officers of the Port. The Emirs (who are descended from Mahomet, and alone carry greene turbante) marched after to the number of 80. This name of Emir is as much to fay as Lordithey which K wear them answer not, and obey none but their Chiefe, called Mirabachi; and their voyce in judgment stands for two. They were followed by the Talismans or Priests of Mahomets Law. and by a great number which study it, and aspire vnto the office of Cadies or Judges, of Cadilesquiers or Musti. The Visiers or supream Judges of the Turks estate, who judge of all affairs in councel, came after with the grand Visier, who is Lieutenant Generall to the Turkish Sultan thorowout his whole empire, and keeps the feals of the empire; he had on his left hand (which is the most honourable rank in Turky) the grand Musti or supreame Bishop of their Law. The musick followed after on horseback, consisting of thirty men with drums and hoboies, being followed by eight Egyptians which caried Biscan tabors, and did a thousand Apish tricks. These were followed by forty musicians marching two and two, some playing on L citerns, others on harps, and fome on lutes after the Turkish maner. A foole, held for a Saint among them, being mufled with a cap and a cloak couered with mutton bones, danced & fung with these instruments: 50 of the chief officers of the Arsenall marcht after him, and 30 men with hammers and other iron instruments, to break down what soener advanced too far in the fire ts, & might hinder the free passage of two trees of an immense height, laden with divers forts of fruits all of wax, carried by many men, and supported from the top and the midstwith ropes. After these trees came 20 officers belonging to Achmat Baffa the high treasurer, godfather to the bride; and he himself alone richly attyred and proudly mounted. After whom came two great torches light, carried by many flaues, and then a third torch of awonderfull bignes, all couered with plats of gold, and thining more with pretious fromes than the flame M that burnt. The Raiffer Agawith fifty of the Princesses officers followed these lights, and after them was caried a great canopie of crimson Veluet, and after it another greater, concred with plates of gold, whose curtaines being shut on all sides hung down to the ground. Under this canopy was the princesse on horseback, with some of her blacke cunuchs, her caroch sollowed couered with cloth of gold, and drawn by foure great white horses, wonderfull beauti- The drath of full. Then followed eight other caroches, in which were a great number of the brides maids, the Saltane ish many Negroes gelt and finally, as virging flaves chosen among the fairest all on horse with many Negroes gelt; and finally, 25 virgins slaues, chosen amongst the fairest, all on horsbacke, having their haire confusedly hanging vpon their shoulders. Such was the pompe of this marriage: but many times the nuptiall feast is intermixt with funerall mourning. For not many daies after, the Sultans second daughter, promised to Nassuf Bassa, was carried to her graue without any pompe or honour: for the Turks make no great esteeme of women.

The day after the marriage, the Grand Seignior did cruelly beat his Sultana, the mother of this daughter, whom he had married to the Captain Baffa; he stabbed her with his handjarre or dagger through the cheeke, and trod her vnder his feet. The reason was, because shee had B strangled a fauorit of his, which was one of his sisters slaues, whom the Grand Seigniour hauing seene, and being enamored with her, sent for her. The Sultana hearing thereof, caused her tobe brought to her lodging, where shee stript her of her apparrell, strangled her, and put her clothes vpon one of her owne slaues, whom she sent to the Sultan in stead of the other, and at herreturne strangled heralfo; as shee had done many others when they once appeared to bee with childe by the Grand Seigniour.

The plague beginning furiously to spoile the City of Constantinople, the Sultan was for- A great played ced to return to his country palace, called the Serail of Darut Baffa, to avoid the danger of this at Conflant no violent contagion the which makes mee thinke that the Turkith Emperouse for their contagions violent contagion: the which makes mee thinke, that the Turkish Emperours for their owner profit dispense with some articles of their faith; for as we have said before, The Turks are so c obstinatly tied to the beleefe of Predestination, as they will not vouchfase to turne from a pestiserous body, when it is carried to the grave, and much lesse forbeare to visit his friends. being fick of the plague, for that (fay they) if we must needs die of this contagion, it is in vain to flie it, for it will find vs where socuer, if not, our health shall neuer be impaired, although we converse with those that are sicke of this disease. But their Sultans know well how to sie the danger; yea and to cause them to be led under the arms that come to kisse his hand, lest they should offer him some violence. Thus we see the defect of false religions, when as we see this marke of vniuersalitie in the faith taken away; for there every man beleeues according to his privat intrest, as wellas among many others which have separated themselves from the truth. to canton themselues in their errors, where we doe often trie the diuersitie of their beleefe.

D Sultan Achmat being in his palace of Darut Baffa, and going to visit a stately Mosque which he caused to be built there, a Deruis or religious Turke thrust on by some deuillish fury, cast agreat stone at him to beat him downe , but the blow of this detestable traitor, fell youn his shoulder, and hurt him but lightly. Achmat commanded they should draw from this wretch the confession of his confederates: but the officers of the port caused him to be executed the next day, fomewhat too fuddenly, and by a death too honourable, for a crime fo ful of abomination for they caused his head to be cut off. A Deruis of the same order had in sormer times fought to murther the Emperour Makomet the second.

On the 14 of Aprill, the Lady Anne Gloner, wife to Sir Thomas Gloner, Embassador residing The Junerall of at Constantinople for the English, was buried with very great solemnity, the like had not bin the lady Glaur feen in that countrey, fince the Turks conquered Constantinople. There were present at this derivise. funerall of most nations in the world; the sermon was preached in a large garden under a Cypresse tree; and although but few of those present did vnderstand it, yet it wrought this effect. that whereas the Iesuits and Friers had formerly possess both Iewes, Turks, and other people, that the English nation since the change of their religion, had neither churches, nor any form of divine service, hereby they perceived, that they had both, and served God far more decently and deuoutly than they themselues; insomuch that the Issuits being assamed of their impostures, and sanderous vntruth, durst not for a while after walke the streets, for seare of the Turks, who threatned them for fo much belying the English. The Sermon being ended, the body was caried from Pera vnto the English graues, which were almost a mile from the places it was closed in lead, and laid in a Caroch concred ouer with blacke veluet, and the horses with blacke cloth. The Dutch Embassador, the Hungarian Agent, the French Colonell with a great number of all nations both men and women followed her to her graue. The tomb was of faire marble, built foure square almost the height of a man, having an Epitaph engraven thereon.

Achmat, eighth Emperor of the Turks.

be Florentines,

We have scene the yeare before, the Island and towns of Lango spoiled by the gallies of G The cafile of Vve naue rection on years of the gaines of Lange rates by Malta and Naples, but the Castle was faued from ruine, by the resistance it made against the Christians attempts: but this yeare in June the great Duke of Tuscans gallies running ouer the Archipelague, assailed it so furiously, as they forced and spoyled it, carrying away twelve hundred prisoners. Mechmet Baffa Admirall at sea, whom we saw even now bussed at his nuptiall pompe, with the Emperours eldest daughter, being aduertised of these spoyles of the Florentines, by the dayly complaints of the Turks which loft their (hipping, and of many other enterprises attempted vpon his Masters countries lying neere the sea shore; he departed from Constantinople in August with three and thirty great gallies, having commanded at the Beyes of the Islands and townes in the Archipelague, to joyne with him, with as many gal. lies as they could make, to stop the Christians courses in the West. But whilst that he is bus. H ed in those seas, the Pirats of Rascia descending into the Euxine sea, by the mouthes of those rivers which discharge their waters into the sea, overran and spoiled the Turks coasts of those

At the firme land Constantine one of the pretending Princes in Moldauia, annoyedall that had any dependance you the Turke. A part of that great army of the King of Polands, which had mutined for their pay, spoiled Podolia; and a Prince of the Tartarians discontent for that Achmat had preferred a cousin of his before him in the inuestiture of the realmof the Tartars Precopians, with 5000 fouldiers spoiled the rivers of Moldauia under the Turks dominion.

and he did the like in the gulph of Nicopolis.

Troubles in Moldania.

This was at fuch time when as miserable Moldauia was the theatre, wheras the Turks, Tar. I tars, and Moldauians acted a bloudy tragedy, 'at the costs and charges of the poore countrey. men. For Tom sho having been chosen Vayuod or Prince of that Province by the Turke Constantine who could not endure that he should reigne, armed the country, onerran it, spoiled it. and made hauocke of all, detaining two Capigi prisoners, whom the Sultan had sent to him, with commandement to obey his will, and a prohibition not to trouble Tom [ho in the poffeffion of his Prouince. But this was a message of hard disgestion to Constantine; hee could not with patience yeeld to this cession of Moldauia and in stead of sending these messengers back to the Turke with an answer hee carried them with him into Polonia, whither he went to demand fuccors, and caused them to be guarded as prisoners. In the meane time by the support and aid of Potofly Gouernor of Velin his brother in law, he obtained from the King of Poland, g that he should be supported against Prince Tomsho his competitor, whom the Turke had aduanced and to make his entry into Moldauia more easie, they resolved to send an Embassador vnto Constantinople, to intreat Achmat to call backe Tomfo to his Port, that Constantine might quietly enjoy Moldauia; and to acquaint him with the right and interest the Polonians had by their capitulations with the Turks, to name a Vayuod or Prince of that Province to the end no wrong might be done vnto them.

This Polonian Embassador being arrived at Constantinople (thinking to be presently dispatched, either by a grant or denial of his demand, & not to stay aboue fifteen or twenty days) being vifited at his arriuall by all the Embassadors of Christian Kings and Princes which remained there: in flead of audience, after fix weekes attendance, hee was arrefled and detained L prisoner, understanding from the Turks, that he should have no liberty untill that the two Capigi, whom Prince Constantine carried into Poland were released.

The troubles and divisions among Christians, neighbours to the Turke, have alwaies ferued as a bridge for this Infidell to invade them, and by this advantage to vsurpe such townes and countries as lie fit for him. Now that Valachia, Moldauia, yea and Transyluania, are tost and turmoiled with continuall diforders and combustions; the Sultan seemes to embrace this occasion, to make himselfe Souereigne of those Provinces, and to get possession of al that lies betwixt the river of Danow, the mountains of Sarmatia, the river of Tibiscus, and the Euxine sea. Hee emploies all his thoughts and inventions upon this subject, to bring his designes to effect. He armes and drawes forces about Belgrade, under the conduct of Bassa Mahomes Bel. M Kergi: He commands the Tartarians to enter into Moldauia, and he sent a nauall army towards the mouth of the river of Danow, which made the frigots of Rassia to dislodge, the which had continually made invoades and spoyles upon his lands. Batteri Prince of Transylvania was at that time before the towne of Cromstad, which he had besieged, but the rediousnesse of this fiege made him resolue to send an Embassador to Constantinople, to demand succours from the Grand Seignior, to the end he might be able to continue this fiege, and to take the towner he gaue this charge to Andrew Giezy, and fent him to the Sultans Port: but in flead of feruing his Master faithfully, hee practised a detestable treason against him, to put the Turke in full possession of Transyluania, and to make him absolute Souereign. The practise was concluded after this manner, That the Baffa Mahomet Belzergi should enter the Province with his army, and that Giezi should ioyne with him certaine troupes, and should deliuer vnto him Veradin, Lippa, and some other strong and important places; and for recompence hee should inuest him in the Principalitie of Transyluania, in the place of Battori, and vnder the authoritie of

This treason might have drawne this miserable Province into ruine, and it may be the rest ncere adjacent, if it had taken the effect which the trecherie of Giezy had promifed vnto himfelfe. But the Bassa of Budavnderstanding that Bassori had some vent of the practise at the Port, and that being now in great feare and perturbation, hee had raised the siege from before Cromstad, and was ready to cast himselse into the armes of the Palatine of Hungary, and to craue reliefe from him; the crafty Bassa knowing that this course would be prejudiciall for the Sultan, and finding that the deposing of Battori would be more difficult than they expe-Acd, hee diverted Mahomet Baffa from attempting any thing against Battori or Transylvania. This act shewes sufficiently, that Christian Princes which thinke to shelter themselves under the shadow of the Turkith crescent, are very ill assured for he never failes to stirve enemies against them, to make them sue for succors, and himselfe necessarie: Then in the end nee expels them, and becomes absolute master of their countries. It was also said, That the Bassa Maho. met would not attempt any thing in Transyluania, by reason of the election of the Emperour Matthias, whereof the Bassa of Buda was assured by the Embassador which the said Emperor fent to Constantinople, to carry the Presents vnto the Sultan, which Embassadour was honorably entertained at Buda by the faid Bassa, and from thence conducted safely to Constantinople.

But not to keep these Turkith troups idle, Mahomet Bassa being aduertised that Confantine the pretending Prince in Moldauia, had been in Poland to crave some assistance from thence, he refolued to imploy his forces that way, to dispossess him and to settle another.

But the better to viderstand the beginning and successe of these Moldanian warres, wee must make a repetition of that which past some yeares before. In the yeare 1608, Ieremie Mohyla Prince or Vayuod of Valachia, died : committing the gouetnment to his brother Simeon, during the minoritie of his three fonnes, Constantine, Alexander, and Bougdan, the eldest being but eight yeares old. He lest three daughters married to three generous Princes of Polonia, Potosky finousky, and Corresky. Prince Simeon continued in the government vntill the yeare 1611; after whose decease the young Prince Constantine by the persuation of his mother, that he might fafely take vpon him the government of Moldavia, and not attend any confirmation from the Sultan, for that Prince Simcon who had been confirmed by the Turke which then reigned, was but Tutor to his Nephew; entred the government. At this time there remained at Constantinople, one Stephano or Tomsho, who had of long time practifed the fauour of one of the Visiers called Mehemet, an Eunuch of Georgia (who was then Chimacham, or Lieutenant to the Grand Vitier) and of fome other Baffacs, as well by money as by other practifes, fuggesting falfly that he was some to Prince Aaron, who had been Vayuod of Moldauia before the deceased Ieremy : and he prevailed so by his practifes and corruption (whereunto the Turks are more subject than any Nation in the World) as hewas admitted to the Principalitie by the Grand Seignior, and having given him to vnderstand by the Visier, that Constantine had thrust himselfe rashly into the government, and that hee would not acknowledge him for his Lord and Souereigne, nor pay the yerely tribute. which was 40000 chequines, hee fent Fouffeyen Agawith 20000 Turks and Tartarians to fettle Stephen or Tomfho in Moldauia, and to expell Prince Conflantine. Which army marched fo fecretly, as they had in a manner furprifed him ; yet drawing together a head of 10000 men, hee resolved to attend the event. The Aga sent to acquaint him with his commission, and among other things threatned him, that if he would not fuffer him to proclaime Stephen Vayuod of Moldania, and yeeld him the City of Yan free, he would cut him in pieces, Where Whereunto Constantine made answer, by the advice of the Prince Potosky his brother in law, G That the Grand Seigniour had been abused: for if hee had vnderstood, that his predecessor had granted vnto the deceased Prince teremy his father, and to Prince Simeen his vncle, That he should succeed his said father in the government: it was not credible that he would seeke to dispossesses the bim by force, without hearing, and install in his place an vnknowne person, who had falsely supposed himselfe to be the some of a Prince of Moldauia: neither should they finde, that he had refused to acknowledge the Sultan for his Souereigne Prince, or denied to continue the same tribute which his father and vncle had paid; but if the Aga would proceed without any respect of his offers, he did hope that the true God of battel would maintain him in his iust desence, and would not suffer an vsurper to prevaile ouer a lawfull Prince. Foufferen Aga, who had no will to capitulate with Prince Constantine, being corrupted by Stephen with H Presents and promises, aduanced with his army, so as the next day they iouned battely but the Moldauians oppress with multitudes of Turks, Tartarians, and Valachians, could not make it good. Wherefore Potosky entreated Prince Constantine to faue himselfe, and to suffer him to fi. nish the battell : but he could by no meanes persuade him, still resoluting to attend the eyent. Whereupon they went both again to the charge with such troups as they had left, and defeated many of the Turks forces; but being oppressed with a new supply of 2000 horse which the Aga fent by Stephen, they were constrained to yeeld themselves to the mercy of their enemies. Prince Constantine fell to the Tartarian share, either for that he had been taken prisoner by some of them, or else was given them by Foussers Aga, to draw a ransome from him, and be in stead of their pay. But they made no great vie of him; for as they led him away, passing I the river of Niestre, hee leapt into it, thinking either to save himselfe by swimming, or vawilling to furniue his difgrace. And as for Prince Potosky, he was carried to Constantinople, and was put into the blacke tower, which is a prison appointed for men of quality, where he continued untill the yeare 1616. The losse of this battell by Constantine, gaue an easie entrance to Stephen into Moldauia, no man daring oppose himselfe against the Turks forces, so as Fons. feyen Aga caused Stephen to be proclaimed Prince of Moldauia in the city of Yas, and thendis. miffed his army, and returned to Constantinople. Such was the fortune of the Prince of Moldauia, ruined by the Turks, and such was the disorder and confusion of his miserable countrev.

This Summer Constantinople and the countrey round about, was annoyed with aboundance of Grashoppers, as it had been in the former yeare: but to free themselves from this denouring vermine, about the middest of Iv'y, the Patriarch of Constantinople, and Alexandria, with divers other Bishops, and Calloires attyred in their copes and other ornaments, went forth in folemne manner at the gates of Andrianople, being the North gate of the City. Whereupon (faid the Greeks) they all perished and indeed a ut this time infinit heapes of them were found dead; but not by reason of their curse, for most were dead before they curfed them, and were to be seene dead upon every bush and twigge of a tree before their curse, and many lived after their curse, and continued vntill the next Summer. The cold deawes which fell this Summer (being extraordinarie) were thought to bee the natural cause thereof, God causing those dewes to fall, to free the countrey from these deuouring L

The troubles of Trenfyluania.

Let vs now describe the miseries of the Transyluanian, and of his Prouince, a table so often represented in this Historie. Gabriel Battori who gouerned Transylvania, as lawfully descended from the Soucreigne Princes thereof, having made himselse a tributarie vnto the Turke, and by his impious actions mingled Mahomets impietie with the Christian Religion; and moreouer, exceeding in his crueltie, became a memorable example to all posteritie, that Princes which carry the glorious name of Christians, when they have once laid aside all seare of the Souereigne of Princes, cannot attend, but a miserable end in their reigne, conformable to the course of their enormities. So Gabriel Batteri holding it a law of State, to fettle his affaires with the ruine of religion, allyes himselfe with the Turke, and with him af. M flicts the Christian Provinces. But seeing many factions made against him, as wel by the defcendents of Botfeay, as by Giezi, Bethlem Gabor, and some other, hee supports himselfewith the forces of Andrew Nage, the head of the Rebels in high Hungarie, who came vnto him to the siege besore Cromstad to assist him in his affaires. Bastori entertained him withall

A shews of curtesie inuited him to dinner in his Tent; and for a greater demonstration of friendthin after dinner they two went to take the air on horseback. Nage had drunk after the Hungarian maner. Bairors intreated him to run his horse a career, and he resused it : the which Batteritaking for an offence, spake many words of contemps vitto him, and hee answered him in the same manner, being more inflamed with wine, than gouerned by reason. Batteri wonderfully offended, that a man of no fort, being but a poore fouldier of fortune, efept vp to fome authoritie among it the fouldiers but by degrees of rebellion, should give him fuch words of indignitic, gaute him three blows on the head with a battle-axe which he held in his hand, and nattori tills flew him. Thus Nage swimmes justly in his own blond, having wickedly, and to the ruine of Nage. his countrey, flored in the waies of vinconstancie and popular tumules, and so he died as he had liued. But Bastor's found himselfe daily oppress with many affairs, which draue him insencibly to Partite against his ruine. Peter Decaci kinfman vnto the deceafed Botfcay, annoied him on the one fide with Batterio groups of foldiers. Andrew Giezi (who had betrayed him in his embaffie to Constantinople) leuied forces to profecute him: and Bethlem Gabora nobleman of Transylvania, affisted by the Turk, took many places from him, after that Giezi had forced him to raife his fiege at Cromstad, and generally all Transylvania revolted against this Prince. To see more plainely in the obscuritie of these consused disorders, you must understand that this province is peopled by three feueral nations, the Sicules, Saxons, and Hungarians. The Sicules, descended from the Scythians, came with Attila King of the Hunnes, in Pannonia, now called Hungary; and ta-& king their way toward their country, they inhabited that part of Transilvania which lies next to Moldavia, and dividing themselves into seven colonies, they built the towns of Kisdi, Orbai, Scipfi, Cykuduarheh, Aranios, and Maros. The Saxons mutinying against the gouernement of Charlemaien King of France, for certain impositions wherwith he had charged them. retyred into Transylvania, and by force seised upon that part of the country which confineth voon Valachia; where they built the towne of Hermen Rad (otherwise called Cibin) Cromstad, Nezen (or Bistric) Meduvisch, Sciespourg, Clausenbourg, and Alba Iulia. The Hungarians inhabited this province from the time of S. Stephen King of Hungary; and having mastred the other nations, they obtained such preheminence amongst them, that since their fuccessors have caused themselves to be called Nobles of Transylvania, and the Vayuods or Princes of the Countrey have bin taken from among them. The Towns of Varradin, Deuer, Zilahi, Gela, and some others, owe their beginnings vnto them. The greatest part of these three nations which inhabit Transylvania, were revolted against Battori; but particularly the Saxons had taken up arms against him, his great crueltie having forced them to this etreame remedie.

Batters being thus abandoned by his subjects, prosecuted by his Nobility, and forfaken of all the world, knowing not whither to fly for succour, and not daring to trust vnto the Turke. who openly favored Gabor; he resolved to try if he could by presents draw the Emperor Matthias to his aid. Wherfore he fent Embassadours unto him to promise all subjection and obedience: his prefents were a long robe or facerdotal cloak of gold, fet with pearle and pretions stones, certain plumes of blacke Herons adorned with pretious stones, a Turkish sword, the scabberd being of filuer richly setwith jewels, ten black horses with rich furniture embroidered with gold and filuer, and a Turkish horse, having halfe the body and legs of the color of gold, with his furniture of crimfon richly embroidered. He laboured to have the Emperour give notice to the Bassa of Buda, That this attempt of the Turks against Transylvania was a breach of the peace. But the Baffa made answer, That his Emperor was not to be blamed if he feifed upon that province, and kept it quiet from the practifes of others, as belonging to himfelf. But Batteri relying not wholly upon this support, but desiring to have more strings to his bow sent Embassadours to the Sultan with rare and rich presents, who had secret treaties and councels with the Bassa's. The which Negronius the Emperors Embassador residing at Constantinople discouering, he sent word vnto the Emperor, that he entertained a monster among

About the same time there came Embassadours from the Saxon townes of Teansylvania. complaining much of the crueltie and tyrannic of Battori. The Saxons (faid they) living

Crucky of Bat. many years in Transylvania, and beautified the provinces with townes, villages, and markets, and had by their vertue obtained many printledges from former Emperouse but Batteri, a gainst his promised faith, and the oath which he had taken, had deprined them of their print. ledges, and affliced them in such fort, as they were in a manersusined. That from hie first can trance, he had fought to root out the antient family of the Saxona: That he had afflicted them with imprisonments and miserable servitude, and had detained John Benner three years in prifon, for no other cause, but for that he knew hee had brought a great estate out of Germanie, He had deprined honest widowes of their estates, and had oppressed others with uniust exaction ons : he had surprised Hermitad the chiefe City of the Saxons, and suffered the Haiduchs to spoil it, and to commit all forts of insolencies. That he had expelled the Magistrates, benithed honest citisens, rauished women, slain the parents, to deprive the children of their inhe-H ritance, and committed all the barbarous cruelties that could be deuised. That hee had fent three hundred Captines to the Sultan for a present many he cut into small pieces, somehee had thrown down from the tops of high mountains and towers, fome he had hung vp by the feet, others he had drawn in pieces with wild horfes & trees; and to conclude, he had practifed all kindes of barbarous cruelties. That having expelled religious Princes out of Moldania and Valachia, hee had made them subject to the Turke: for no other end, but that getting an occasion to circumuent the Christians, he might wast all with fire and sword, having multitudes of Barbarians to second him. And for a conclusion of his notable crueltie, having fired the town of Gaudin, he had made choice of twenty of the principall inhabitants, and giving euery one of them a pike, he forced them in his presence to kilone another in the middest of I the market place.

But God reuengeth his excesse in his suine, whereinto we shall presently see him runbead. long miserably : for Rethlem Gabor his capital enemy, having joined his forces with those of Baffa Serder, they both entred together into Transylvania, forced Lugasti, tooke Deue, and ftrooke a great terror into the whole Country. Ogli Baffa on the other fide furmounteth the difficultie of the waies, and lodgeth with his troups in the suburbs of Cromstad, and from thence went and camped over all the tract of Barry or Barfac. Thus Battori fees himfelf opprest by an enemy, from whom he can expect nothing but his miserie and ruine. He attended fuccors from the Emperor, under the conduct of the Palatine of Hungary and Fortgatile; they came, but not fuch as were able to relift the Turks. This made him write to Trinau for the le- K uying of foldiers, but the hatred they bare him generally, deceived his hopes, no man would march under his enfigues. This refusall makes him distrustfull, he dares not confer with any man touching the affairs of the war. A treaty of peace seemes most fit for his affaires : hee makes an ouerture to his most familiar friends, & tels them he holds it necessary to purchase his peace with Serder Baffa, at what price foeuer, yea were it in delivering into his hands the places of greatest importance. But hee receives no other answers from them, but that they had rather die than aduise him to it. Thus he sees himselfe void of all hopes of safety is his affairs: he wanted mony, his subjects, yea even his soldiers hated him, as a prince abandored to all crueltie, and for his last remedy, and the most ordinary in base and cowardly mindes, he fel into dispair, intreating one of his servants to kill him ; but the other refused him that L honor, suffering him to draw on his miserable life, vntil that within some few daies after, going forth to view where his troups were lodged, being in an open chariot, accompanied only with two gentlemen, fifty of his foldiers which attended him in an ambush, shot at him, slew him, and hurt those that did accompanie him. This accident happened in the yeare 1613. when as this vnfortunat Battori went to give an account vnto God of the bad government of

Beiblem Gaber

Some few dayes after, Bethlem Gaber was openly declared Prince of Transylvania by the Baffa Serder ; who gaue him this aduertisement at his introduction; Batteri shall serne for an example to had Princes; I doe not thinke that you will follow his fleps. Beware that you attempt not any thing without the prinitie of my Master. Maintaine peace with your neighbours, and make men of ex. M perience and honefly of your Councell. Transylvaniadid yet feare the continuance of a storme of a farall Warre; when as in leff, than forty daies it faw it folfe fetled in the calme of fweet peace, by the general acknowledgement which all the Townes made vnto Bethlem Gaber, and the oath of fidelitie which they tooke vnto him as to their elected Prince; notwithstanding that the Emperor had imploted all his credit to hinder it. But the defire of peace, and feare of the Turks armies, drew all the Gouernors of towns to acknowledge Gabor. Such were the affairs of Transylvania, disordred by the Turk. Now let vs make an end of the remainder of the year 1612, the which we have deferred, for that we would not interrupt the relation of the affairs of this prouince.

We have faid elswhere, That the King of Persia had offered conditions of peace to Sultan Achmat, much to his advantage, feeing that he yeelded himfelfe the Turks tributary, in regard of certain lands which he had conquered from him. Now the Visier Naffuf, General of the army against the Persian, brings his Embassadour to Constantinople to conclude this peace. A Versian nm. B Naffuf ariued with his army and the Persian Embassador at Scudaret, right ouer against Constantinople, whither most of the Bassa's of the Portwent to salute him, and then returned. But ple. the grand Visier staid there two days; on the third he past ouer to Constantinople, where hee was entertained at the water fide by all the Baffa's that accompanied him; an infinit number of Ianizaries going before with their pieces, and some of them in armor, after whom followed their Aga on horseback : then came a great number of Iamoglans, and the Emirs or kindred of Mahomet with their green turbants, with many blind men shouting aloud: These holy men caried the banner (as they fay) of Mahomet, and the people standing by kissed it with great denotion as they past. After them came the Chaoux on horf back, the Bassa's, & then the chief Musti, and last of all Nassufa himself: after whom sollowed the treasure he brought with him for the Emperor, being 234 Mules loden with gold and filuer. The Visier as he past by the Sultans window bowed himfelfe very low vnto him, from whom hee had a nod with his head, and so fee spurres to his horse and rode away fast, as the manner of the Turkes is when they falute a greater man than themselues, presently to run or ride away apace. The Visier being come to the Serail, went in to the Sultan to kiffe his hand; where hee continued a whole houre, the rest of the Bassa's attending without. There were present at this daies pompe the Emperors Embassador, the French, the English, Polonian, Low-Countries, and Venetian; the Persian remaining stil at Scudaret. The grand Visier as he past by the Emperors Embassador, put off his hat and faluted him, but not the rest. The same day Tomsho, who had bin lately made Prince of Moldauia by the grand Seigniour, fent many Polonians to Constantinople, whom hee had taken in the Warres. All which (notwithstanding they threw downe their Caps and offered to turne Turkes) were put to death. And within few daies after, the Visier Nassuf sitting in the publique Divano, had three robes sent him from the grand Seig-nior to grace him.

Achmat having a will to let the Persian see the magnificence of his Court, went out of Achmat flate. Constantinople; and under pretence to go take the aire at his Country palace called Darut Is they into Baffa, he takes occasion at his return to make a stately entry into his Imperial city. The generall Surveyour being advertised of his will, caused all the waies from his palace of Darne vnto the City to be couered with fand, the which containeth two French leagues, or four English miles. This done, the Emperour parted for his retinue, and entred in pomp into Constantinople. The order of his entry was in this manner. A great number of men at Armes marched first on horsebacke, and after them some troups of foot, the Cadies of Constantinople or men of justice; and all the Talismans, or those of Mahomets Law, in very great numbers followed after : and after these followed the Visiers and Bassa's in very great pomp. After whom followed the Sultans houshold, that is to say, ten men leading in their hands tenne goodly horses richly caparisoned, the last of which had the bridle and saddle all coursed with pretious stones: the Sultans Target was made fast vnto the saddle, and vpon it did hang euenalmost to the ground a great tassel of pearls; and ouer all this, a long horse cloath or couering for an horse, the which was embroidered so thicke with pearle, as the ground could not be discerned. After which followed the rest of the Emperours houshold in divers troupes: first, fifty Ianizaries on foot, every one of them leading dogs in leashes, Mastifs, or Irish greyhounds : the goodliest of all were those which the French Embassadour had presented vnto the Sultan. Secondly, the grand Seigniors footmen, called Pelks, who were Persians by Nation, all wel attired, wearing on their heads bonnets of filuer and gilt, in form of pots. Thirdly, threescore archers on foot, in the middest of which the Sultan came, attired in a rich robe of G cloath of gold imbroidered with pearles and diamonds: his flaues were inricht after the same maner: his turbant couered with five plumes of black herons feathers, inricht with great Dia. monds, and a chain of the same stones about the lower part of his turbant: vpon his little fin. ger he had a diamond of a large bignes and inestimable price, which gaue a maruellous great light. He was proudly mounted upon a goodly horse richly caparisoned, the saddle was embroidred with gold, pearle, and Diamonds, the stirrops of pure gold set with many diamonds, and from the horses neck did hang great tassels of pearle, which were so great, that they were exceeding pretious. After the grand Seignior followed three men on horsebacke, carrying in their hands, the one his arms, the other his cloak, and the third his Imperial turbant, & these were attended on by certain Esquires and gentlemen all on horsebacke. Then came the mu. H fick after the Turkish maner, confishing of threescore men on horsebacke, which played vpon Fifes, Clerons, and trumpets. Next followed an hundred pages of the Sultans brauely moun. ted, and followed by many Eunuchs; fifty of which pages caried euery one a falcon you his fift having their heads inricht with diamonds; and thefe were followed by thirty gards of the Port. Then came fifty falconers and huntimen richly attyred and wel mounted four whereof had either of them before him voon his faddle bow a Leopard couered with cloath of gold: with a great number of other Pages who were very beautifull, chosen amongst the infants of the tribute, and unfortunatly appointed for the filthy and unnatural pleasures of their master. whose garments after the Turkish maner were pretious, and made of rich cloth of gold curled. They were followed by a great troup of yong men plainly attired in cloath, having voon their 1 heads yellow caps pointed in form of a fugar loafe, and these were ordained to serue the Sul-

There were moreouer diuers Beglerbegs attending the Sultan in this pomp; as of Bolna, Buda, Romania, Natolia, and others; every company going diftinct, both of horse and soot. with the Bassa's scruants all gallantly attyred & wel mounted. And after them followed Not fuls attendants, being fine hundred in number richly armed. There were also the Kings Firemen, Calkers, Azappes, the Rices or officers of gallies with spears in their hands : all that belonged to the Arfenal, the Carters which gouerned the carts going to war, and their captains, then the shot-men with their banner, and the Armorers all in armor with their banner. There were also the banners of the grand seignior Mahomet, and of the grand Visier, every one in his K order before the grand Seignior : and after all followed the Capigies and officers of his Kitchen. The number of all forts of attendants in this pomp was fo great, as they were reckoned to be forty thousand persons.

The Persian Embassador, for whose sake Achmat had made this stately shew, to the end he might carry back into his country a pattern of the Otheman state and greatnesse, caused to bee cast out before his lodging, when as the Sultan passed by, 100 pieces of silke, the which were gathered up by the archers of his gard, wherof they made good purchase. All these magniscences, added to those we have formerly related at the mariages of the Sultans daughter and fister, with other pomp celebrated in France, Spain, Naples, and Germany, for the mariagesof Lewis 13, King of France, with Anne of Austria Infant of Spain and of the Prince of Spaine L with the Lady Elizabeth of Bourbon the Kings eldest fister; and for the coronation of the onpresse, and the Emperors entry into Notemberg, may give vnto this yeare 1612 the title of magnique or stately.

The Perfian

prefents to sbe Saltano

Foure daies after Sultan Achmais entry into the Imperal city, the Persian Embassador had audience, and was admitted to kisse his hand. He presented vnto his Maiestie in the behalfe of the King of Persia his master, foure hundred Balls of silke, a Besonard stone as bigge as a mans fift, with some others that were leffe; nine bags of leather ful of Turquoifes, the which were a foot and a halfe long, and aboue foure fingers broad; a great number of Tapestries of Wooll, Silke, cloath of gold and filter, with many other things of great price, and very tare. Their complements being ended, they began to treat feriously of a peace betwirt two great M and antient enemies, the Turk and the Persian; the which after some difficulties was concluded upon these conditions: That the Persian King should pay yearly unto the Turkish Empesor by way of tribute, a quantitie of filk to the burden of two hundred camels: that the King

A of Persiahis sonne should be called Bassa of Tauris, and that the Cadi or Sourreigne Ludge of that towne should be sent from Constantinople. This peace thus concluded to the Turks aduantage, the Persian Embassador returned vnto his Master, having left most of his traine dead of the Plagueat Constantinople, Being arrived at Tauris, the King of Persia sceing this peace to be so dishonourable, and burthensome for him, he caused his Embassadours head to be cut off; and sent backe the Chiaux, who was come from Constantinople to see him sweare the neace. Some write that he did him some indignities, which made these two great Monarchs returne againe to armes.

The Grand Visier Nassuffaster his returne to Constantinople, to shew his great power and authority, procured meanes to have the Chimacham (who had formerly supplied the place B of the Grand Viller in the absence of Amurath Baffa, and untill the returne of Naffuf) to be depriued of his Bassaes place, and fent presently ouer vnto Scudaret, vnder pretence of preferring him to a government necre vnto Trebizond in the confines of Turky, but with an intent to deprive him of his head. The friends of this Chimacham, (who were many and great in Court) feeing him to diffgracefully fent away, and doubting Naffuf his purpose, procured leave of the Grand Seigniour to have him fent for backe againe, for that hee was an old man, and might from thenceforth live at home in quiet; and for his former services done. a thouland Aspers a day allowed him for his entertainement; which Nell'of tooke very dif-

During the Persian Embassadours abode at Constantinople, the Emperous Matthias (suc- The Emperous C cessour to Redniphus his brother) sent an Embassadout to the Sultan, to complaine of the Marthin sent enterprises which were made dayly vpon Transylvania, a Province which he said belonged secons successful image vnto him, as a dependance of his Realme of Hungary. This Embassadour called Negroni was received at the Court, and admitted to kiffe the Sultans hand : but his Presents were little effectived, for that they were of leffe value than those which they had lately received from the Persian. His demands to have the Province of Transylvania, were grounded upon an Article inferted among those of the peace betwixt the Emperour and Botskay, at that time chofen Prince of Transylvania, that is to say, That Botskay dring without iffue male, Transylvanid should remaine at the dishosition of his Imperiall Majesty. This Article being read by Negroni in the Turks Councell, whither he had beene admitted; the Muphti or Soucreigne Priest of D Mahomets Law, answered, That it was contrary to his Law: fo the demands of this Embassadoor touching Transylvania were rejected, seeing that Botskay had no power from the Sultan (said the Grand Visser) to treat with the Emperour, and to give him Transylvania after his death. Negroni grounded this gift of Boiskay (mentioned in the faid Article) upon the eighth Article of the peace betwixt the Turke and the Emperour, concluded in the Isle of Dannow, by Amurath Visier, and the Deputies of his Imperial! Majesty, in these words; I has all which had beene granted in the treaty of peacemade at Vienna, to Botskay, should be duely and faithfully observed. Nalluf the Grand Visier replied, That the Bassa Amurath being then Visier, The mallice and might erre in figning these Articles of the peace vpon the Dannow; and at the same instant Turks, he shewed forth some other Articles, whereas that was not inserted, saying, That the Sultan E would faithfully performe those and no others, pressing the Embassadour Negroni to signe them; the which he refused to do: so as Nassuf vsed some threats to terrifie him; but Negroni replied, That he was in their power, and that in this case he had rather lose his life, and die gloriously for the good of his masters affaires, than to have it taken from him at his returne to Vienna, with shame and infamy, having signed those Articles. Finally, he promised to aducttise his Imperial Majesty, and to certific them of his pleasure: which promise for this time ended the contention. In the beginning of this yeare, Sultan Achmat, after the reception of the Persian Embaffadour, and the starely entry hee made into Constantinople, went to lie at Adrianople. where his Ianizaries and Spahies began to mutiny, spurning at their Bread and Rice which F was given them for their dayly entertainement; and being demanded the reason of their infolency; they answered, That no Emperor before him had so carried out his men in the depth of Winter: which answer did much insence Nassufa. This Visier was in such credit with Vuuuu the Grand Seigniour, as during his abode at Adrianople, bee came three times in person pri. G uately to visit him, who grew so powerfull ouer his masters affections, as he obtained a privil ledge, That it might not be lawfull for any man to speake with the Grand Seigmour privat. ly, but himselfe. Being returned to Constantinople, there hapned a great fire, in which there were fine hundred houses burnt. The Visier Wassaff comming to see it quenched, and finding some Ianizaries more carefull to breake open lockes, and rifle shoppes, than to doe any good firuice, he firucke out the braines of one of them with his mace, and brake the arme of

It had beene an antient custome in Constantinople, that the owner of the honse with all his family where the fire began, should be put to death for their negligence : but it happens to be the fire began, the state of the st ning that the Emperors owne Seraill, in the time of Mahomes father to Achmas, being feron H fire, Cicala Baffa prefented a petition with him, that this custome might be abolished, holding it vnjust that other men should be put to death, and the same let passe in the Emperors owne house : whereunto he yeelded, holding it reasonable. And soone after there hapned another great fire, at which the Visier caused many of the Ianizaries to be hanged stinding them too buffe in rifling houses, and he went up and downe the florers with his feimiter in one hand, and a lanizaries head in the other, which he had cur off. The Grand Saignior fam Holy Wil ter vnto the Visier, wherein he had dipt a piece of Mahometa garment, the which weing proceed into the fire, the Turks faid, it ceased presently; yet by the report of visible witnesse; it but? ned foure houres after. The Grand Walier Naffir was a cruellenemy to the lanizaries, of whom he sent sixteene thousand away into Asia, and would not suffer any moe to be made, buroilly Spanies; and ouer such I anizaries as remained he made his owne sequents robe Chuthagles. and Agaes or Captaines ouer fiftigs and hundreds; fortifying himfelfe by all-means he could deuist, against the future time, to preuent his sudden ruine; but all this could not present him from a shamefull fall as you shall hereafter heare.

In the meane time let vs passe vnto Affricke, to observe the troubles which fell in the Realme of Fez Realmes of Fez and Moroco, the quarrels betwint Prince Xerif Qualey Gidan, and the Xerif Mulcy Achmet, Ben Abdalla his nephew, and the victories of Cidan against Abdalla. The Family of the Kerifi Princes of Fez and Moroco, tooke its beginning fome hundred and four yeares fince, from Mahomet Xerif, borne at Tigumedet in Dara, at this present one of the Prouinces of Moroco: he was Alfaqui or preacher of Mahomets Law, who feeing the divisions betwixt the Souereigne Princes of those Realmes, and that the Portugalls had seised of the chiefe Forts of Moroco, he began with three of his fonnes, Abdalla, Hamet, and Mahamet, to lay the foundation of a new Monarchy, supported by three pillars. That is to fay, by a counterfeit piety and disguised Religion, voon a godly pretext to make warre against the Portugals Christians which were in Affricke; and vpon a passionate desire to settre the Mahometane Moores which were in their pay, to the end they might by that meanes weaken them, and chase them with more case out of the territories of Moroco. The King who at that time held the scepter of Fez (seeing nothing but the outside of the Xerifs designes) suffered his three fonnes to display their standard against the Christian Portugals in the Realme of Moroco: Innovations and nouelties are commonly pleafing to the common people. At this beginning, L these three leaders were followed by a great number of souldiers, they vanquished in many encounters, and the bruit of their new victories flying into the Realme of Moroco, retired the Moores from the Portugals seruice, whom they deseated soone after, with their Commander Lopes Bariga. True it is, that it was to their losse; for abdalla the eldest of these three brethren lost his life in this combat. But they seised upon the great towne of Taradente in the Prouince of Sus, and of the Prouinces of Herra, Ideuaca, Vbideuaca, Cuz, Guzule, and in a manner of the whole country betwixt Moroco and mount Atlas, feeling their principality in Taradente, whereas the Kerif their father carried the name of the Gouernour of the Prouince of Sus.

The King of Moroco fearing the greatnesse of these new Conquerours, dissembled the M desire hee had to bring them vnder, assuring himselse that time would present him some good occasion: so suffering them to enter into Moroco: but they prevented him, they took

A away his life by poylon, and feiled vpon his Realme. The King of Fez, who had by an indifcreet simplicity suffered them to take arms, and by that means to open the way to a great fortune, hee faw afar off the tempest of these vnjust ipoilers to fall vpon Moroco and other places. The feare of the like calamity did much afflict his minde: but the Xerifi entertained this idle Prince with faire shewes; they abused his bounty, and with the fourth part of the rich spoiles which they had taken in so many townes and Provinces, they full his distrust afleepe: moreouer, they fend him the tribute due for the Realme of Moroco, Hamet takes upon him the name of King of Moroco; Mahomet that King of Sus, in the towne of Taradente; and by a good intelligence betwixt them, they make themselves searcfull to all those countries, so as they have nothing more to feare, than the threats and vengeance of heaven. They then began to contemne the King of Fez, and plainly to deny the tribute of Morocospretending for their reason, that they were issued from the line of Makomet. This contempt made the King of Fez. The King of roopen his cies; he finds the faults past, by the interest of the present: he sees the Xerifs had Franch geth abused the liberty which hee had given them : whereupon hee went to field with an army of difficult. 18000 men, and planted his siege before Moroco; but as his enemies party was stronger than his, so he was chased away, and his army defeated at the passage of a river. Thus the Xerifi became peaceable possessions of Moroco. The peace of the country made these men idle, and idlenessed drew the two brethren into quarrell; they mustred up their forces and came to fight, where after two bloudy battels, Mahomes being victor, he tooke his eldest brother Hames, deprived him of his Realme and liberty, and made him end his daies miferably in prifon. Thus C God doth punish the vijust spoiler of another mans good: we shall see in their posterity the continuance of the same quarrell,

Mahomet settled souereigne in Moroco by bloud and fratricide, as monstrous in ambition as in cruelty, he turned the fame armes wherewith hee had beaten and vanquished his eldest brother, against the King of Fez (whose improvidence had suffered Mahomet and his brethren to take armes, under the deceitfull title and pretence of making warre against the Christian Portugals) he affaulted him with great forces, vanquished him, tooke him prisoner, and depriued him both of Realme and life. Thus the Xerifs in the person of this Mahomet became Soucreigne Princes of Fez and Moroco. The vistory so happily gotten of so many nations, made him fearefull; but by his cruelty hee drew vpon his descendents the just judgement of him who punisheth the excesse and enormity of crimes unto the fourth generation. His posserity was miserable, the vnjust desire of reigne (one ruining another) entertained the brethren in perpetuall discord. For Cidan now King of Fez and Moroco, was lately expelled by his brother Kequi; but afterwards Fortune changing her inconstant fauour, Kequi was pursued by Cidan, defeated, and forced in the yeare 1610 to faue his life in Algarbe in Portugall. Abdalla the sonne of Requi seeing his fathers affaires thus desolate, retires himselse towards the mountaines in the Province of Sus: where finding opportunity to annoy his vucle Cidan, he made daily incursions upon his territories, with some troups of Arabians who had joyned with him being 200 horse and 200 foot. But finding this to be a long course to attain vnto the conquest of the Realme from whence he had been expelled, he bethought himselfe that some certaine E counterfeit fiction in Religion, had in former times brought in his grandfather, and made him Aprophificinabsolute Lord of a great country; wherefore he made vse of a prophesie forged in his ambitious spirit: and to worke an impression in the peoples minds (casie to be moved with a pal-ened by religi. fion of Religion) he fent certaine religious Mahometans through the country, with a flew of on Turks. holy fimplicity, who went preaching from place to place, That one Falquere a man of holy life, had given vnto a fonne of his a Drumme of an admirable power and vertue, commanding him expressely, to keepe it carefully, untill that a Prince called Abdalla should come into Moroco, being expelled by the injustice of his owne bloud; and that then be should beat this Drumme, and that the people at the found thereof might go to the war with all fafety; that it should be helpefull to them, give peace vnto the Realme, and settle all the customes and an-F tient lawes to their common content. Thus they preached this prophetic, the which they faid was now accomplished, seeing that this prophetical! Drum had beene found, it at Abdalla the eldest Prince of the house of the Xerifs had caused it to be beaten, exhorting all men to follow the war for the common good of the country.

Achmat, eighth Emperour of the Turks.

These vanities being preached by these ignorant and malicious Religious Turks, increased G the number of Abdallaes party: whereof Cidan being advertised, he sent a great army against him into the Province of Sus, vnder the command of Alcas Elmye, to hinder the progresse of his designes: But Abdalla finding these forces to approch, retired himselse towards the mountaines, from whence he might charge the enemies army, the which he did so happily, as with-Abdalla descain sew daies he cut off five thousand of his men, This successe did so advance his affaires, as his troups encreased daily, so as Cydan was forced to go with new forces to fight with him, the which was the cause of his ruine: for at this time he was inuested, and notwithstanding the good successe of his false prophesses, lightly grounded vpon the found of a Drum, he was defeated and flaine in this yeare 1612.

Gotardus, discoursing of this miraculous King of Mauritania, whom he cals Muley Hamet, H writeth that he was charmed with diuelish incantations, and freed from alloutward force, ca. rying himselfe for a Dinine Prophet: That with one hundred and eighty horse, and two hundred foot, he went to make head against Cydan King of Moroco, having forty thousand men: That his fouldiers (who were fo few in number) being ready to fly, he perfuaded them with a cunning speech to prepare to fight: That comming neere to Cydans campe, they might see great Army of enemies fighting against them, in which there were fine thousand of Creams Army ouerthrowne, and the rest put to flight, and yet Hamet had not advanced with his troupes: That within few daies after, comming with his troupes tyred to a river fide hee commanded them not to drinke nor wash in that river, which if they did they would die: but some neglecting his command, thinking to quench their thirst died suddenly. He tooke many places in those mountainous Regions, which no man had formerly subdued; his forces encreasing dayly having five and twenty thousand men, and vowing to goe against the Christians, more came vnto him: so as he went against Cydan with a good Army, who likewise attended him. Hamet persuaded his souldiers that no shot could hurt them; so as they assaulted Cydans campe with such fury, as within leffe than an houres space they had slaine about fix thousand men, and put the rest to flight. They write that Hamet lost not about four or fine, and that such as were strucke with any bullet, shewed markes but no wounds; and that the great ordnance either shot over them, or the pouder vented out at the touch hole, and wrought no effect. Cydan having lost his brother in the fight, fled with all his treasure, to recouer new forces, and in the meane time Hamet made himselfe master of the whold Coun. trey. There were certaine Hollanders admitted vnto him, whom they found fitting vpon a carpet made of the barke of trees, having a white shirt, and a long garment vpon it, a red cap on his head, bare thighes, and red shooes, a bag about his necke, and in it he had his, Alcaron, a short crooked sword and a dagger hanging by him. Being saluted by the Hollanders, hee willed them to fit downe by him, telling them that hee was fent from Heaven, to purge the World from cuill, and to prepare the Law of God; to expell Cidan out of his Kingdome, and to restore peace vnto the World: wherefore hee aduised them not to have any commerce with Cydan, nor to affift him in any fort. They observed many markes upon his body, he had one blew tooth, all the rest beeing white, haire vpon either shoulder, a red circle in the palme of his right hand, and the proportion of a spurre vpon his right foot. Having gotten somewill. ctorics against Cydan, and taken the towne of Moroco, in the end his diuellish art failing him, he was flaine as you have heard. Such were the affaires of Affricke, in the Realme of Fezand Moroco.

But in Algier a wonderfull drought had caused cruell combustions; it had so denouted arought of fit the fruits of the earth before their maturity, as there followed a wonderfull famine throughrilly at Algiro out the whole land. The Turks attributed the cause of their misery sometimes to their sins; then to the comming of the Moores, who had beene expelled out of Spaine, as a pernicious vermine; and sometimes to the licentiousnesse of Christians, which lived in those places. Wherefore in the beginning of May this yeare, the Iudge of the towne ordained, That all the Turks should make their deuout praiers to Mahomet their Prophet to obtaine raine, so M necessary in that country; that the Moores should depart the towne within three daies vpon paine of death; and that all the Christians, as well free as bond slaves, should cause their heads and their beards to be shauen, this was speedily executed; for the Turks decrees require a

A prompt obedience. But the miserable Moores which could not get out of Algier within their three daies prefixed, detained either by sickenesse, or some other impediment, were all cut in pieces. For thirteene daies, there was nothing feene within the towne but processions of Turks without Turbants, crying and howling after their manner to obtaine raine from their false Prophet: but he which commands Soucreignty ouer times, from whose hand proceed faireweather and raine, and which makes the earth fruitfull, held the pipes of Heauen yet stopped, to open them at more religious and holy vowes than the superstitious clamours of these Insidels. For Bernard Murroy, of the Order of the redemption of captines, hearing that the Turkes meant to reuenge their miseries vpon them, and to ruine a little Chappell which the Christian slaues had in the prison, for the pious exercises of their Religion, obtained(by the means of Bine Confull of the French in Algeer) permission for the Douan, or Turkish Ludge, to make processions, and to pray vnto God to send them the dew of Heauen, which was so necessary for them. All the Christian slaues which were prisoners, continued their denotions for the space of sine daies : but on the fourth day being the eighth of May, there fell The denone such abundance of raine vpon Algier, as these poore Christians seeing their praiers heard in prairies the the midde R of the enemies of their faith, gate infinite thankes vnto God for his great mercy tante raine,

These miserable Christian slaues were still detained in yrons and cruell seruitude, by this accident. This Murrey of the Order of the Redemption of captines, accompanied with two others of the same Order, had redeemed to the number of one hundred thirty and fix: but when he was ready to embarke them, their euill fortune would haue it, that the gallies of Genoa running alongst that coast, landed some men neere vnto Algier, where they tooke the Basfaes sonne of that towne, with many other Turks, and amongst this number a Virgine of Algier, of a very noble Family, and of as rare a beauty, for the mifery of these slaves: for that when as the Baffacs fon and the others were redeemed by a Frigot which the father had font, the faire Algerian Virgine was still detained by a Captaine of the Genowaies, who had retyred to Caluy an Island adjoyning, there to satisfic his defires with more ease, vpon the fraile and fading perfection of this faire flaue, which had deprived him of his liberty. In the meane time the Bassa of Algier seeing his son returned with the other Turks, and not the Algerian Virgine, commanded that the hundred thirty and fix flaues should be put againe into yrons, D with the three Religious men which had redeemed them. Thus this feminine beauty, or rather the passion of the Genowaies, who holds the possession so deare, makes a great number of Christian soules to suffer by insupportable servitude, howsoever they of his Nation (flattering his disordered lust) say that his desire was, to win her to God, and to make her a Christian, caused him to keepe her so carefully.

These suffered in Algier the losse of their liberty: But a Capuchen Frier, a Florentine by A coputer Nation, endured at Tunes the losse of his life, by the cruelty of the Moores chased out of of Florence Spaine, and retired into those countries. This religious man being a flaue among the Turks, Tunks, Tunks, attended dayly from Florence, or from some other place, mony to redeeme his liberty : but it hapned one day disputing in a Barbars house with a Morisque, concerning Christian Religi-E on the zeale of his faith transported him so far, as to say among divers. Turks, That his Religion was better than that of Mahomets. These words tooke criminously in that place, were reported by the Morisques to the Cadi or Judge of the towne, whom they prest with such horrible clamors and cries, as he pronounced sentence of death against this Capuchen. He wasdeliuered vato them, and they stripped him naked, leading him with infamy through Tunes, some spitting in his face, others casting durt at him, and so they led him out of the towne, where they tyed him vnto a post, and they being cruelly insenced by a speech which a Morrabour or religious Turke faid vnto them, That be among them that game him not one blow He dies glorwith a flone, should be no good Turke; they stoned him to death, where afterwards they burnt his outly for the hody and show the other into the minds body, and threw the ashes into the winde.

The martyrdome of this Capuchen, was followed by the constant confession (amidst the An enterprise violence of torments) of a penitent Renegado, a Florentine by Nation, and Captaine of the of source stages chiefegallie of Chio, foure Frenchmen being flaues in the Island of Chio, in the patron or chiefe gally, belonging to the Bey or Gouernour of the Island, they resolved to recover G or entere garry, belonging to the beyone their lives, to returne into France, and carry into some Port of Christendome that gally, being the best appointed in the whole hauen. They drew vnto their party the Captaine which commanded, being a Florentine Renegado. Their enterprife thould have beene executed when as they should goe to land to cut wood. But whe. ther that the scribe were trecherous to his companions, or transported with some rash indiscretion; being on land, hee spake these words aloud, the which ouerthrew both the defigne, and them that projected it; Hoe, we will returne into Christendome. A Turke which was neere, taking hold of these words, reported them unto the Patron; who presently layed hold upon the Scribe, and drew from him the confession of all the enterprise. He presently sends an hundred men towards the gally, to feife vpon the foure French saues and the Captaine, H But these fine made such a generous resistance, as if the other slaves, who were for the most part Moldanians, or of the Provinces which border vpon the blacke fea, had had the course to fight for their liberty, without doubt the French mens enterprise had succeeded happily. But what could fine men do against an hundred? yet they slew fifteene, and wounded many? the foure Frenchmen were all flaine, and the Florentine Captaine was taken aliue, and teferued to the rigour of a cruell death. For they continued him fix houres together in most vielent torments, hee still calling upon the holy and facred name of Iefus Chrift, euen to the last gaspe, and detesting the errours and falshood of the law of Mahomet. This hapned in October

The Vnited

A little before, the Estates of the vnited Prouinces, and Count Maurice seeing the losfes which the ships of Holland suffered in the Mediterranean Sea, many of them being taken Embajiant to the Turkish gallies, and a great number of their men made slaves : to the end they might bee freed from that danger, and have a fafe passage for their ships, and procure liberty for their captines, they resolved to make a league with the Turke. Wherefore they sent Corne. ilus Hage to Constantinople: who not onely willingly accepted of that Embassie, but performed it with fuch differetion, as hee purchased great credit and commendation to himselfe. and much profit to the Prouinces. He had resolved at first to passe through Hungary buthe found to many croffes and obstacles, by some that were Creatures to the Pope and Spaniard. as he was forced to turne out of the way, and fetch a great circuit. First of all, he fell into the hands of the Archduke Ferdinand, who caused him to be examined, and admonished to desist g from his purpose: After which he was tost at Sea, and in the end having surmounted all dengers, he recoursed Constantinople, the first of May. Hee had expresse charge from the Vnited Estates to labour for three things. The first was, to treat of the deliverance of the Hollanders that were flaues. The second, to make a league with the Turke. And the third, toobtaine from him a free nauigation for the Hollanders, throughout all the feas and ports of his Empire.

This Embassadour was brought to kisse the Sultans hands, and was fauorably received the presented vnto his Majesty in the name of the Estates of the united Prouinces, his Lettersof Embassic, with the Presents which follow: Three birds of Paradise of rare & precious plumes, wonderfull goodly to behold, and valued at eight hundred pound sterling: two vessels of L Christall wonderfull rich and beautifull: foure other vessels made of fishes bones, whereas the Art seemed miraculous in the grauing: forty pieces of cloath of gold of divers colours: fiue pieces of filke, fiue of Damaske, fiue of filke watered, and fiue plaine: A staffe of an Blephants tooth grauen with admirable industry. A Parret shut in a cage of Christall, so artificially done, as no man could discerne the entry : and many faire and rich table clothes of Holland cloth, most part powdred with floures to the life, and wrought in their linely colour. The which the Sultandid accept with admiration. All these things shew sufficiently, That the Estates from the beginning or soone after haueraised handy workes as well as traffique and nauigation to the highest point of persection.

The fixth of Iuly following, the league was fworne betwixt the Othernan Emperour, and M the United Provinces of the Low. Countries, by the which Achmat promised to cause tobe fet at liberty, all the Hollanders that were detained flaues within his Empire : That the

A traffique should be free forthe Hollanders shippes throughout all his seas and hauens: and moreouer hee granted, That the Estates should have an Embassadour residing at his Port. This alliance with the Turke, for the which they have so often, and with little reason blamed the French, hath beene affected and sought by the English and Spaniards, as we have said elsewhere , and now by the Hollanders, whose Estates proceed in all their affaires with such weight and measure, as it seemes they doe nothing but with great reason, and to good the Morisques Granadines chased out of Spaine, and retited into the Leuant. These hauing by Presents wonne the sauour of the Cadi, or Iudge of the place, who was a Negro newly settled in that charge by the Grand Visier Nassuf; they obtained power from him to thrust all the Iewesout of Pera, and to ruine their Synagogues. This power they executed with all violence: And yet these miserable Iewes durst not make their complaints vnto the Magistrate, except one of their sea which dwelt in the Isle of Chio, who being then at Constantinople, and supposing hee had more credit than the rest, went to complaine to this Cadi Negro, who presently caused to bee given vnto him five hundred blowes with a cudgell, in stead of doing him justice; so dangerous a thing it is to have to doe with such vnjust

The infolencies of the Morifques transported them further: for after they had expelled the Iewes out of their dwellings, they threatned to doe vnto the Christians at Pera, as much as had beene done vnto them in Spaine: and they bragged, That they would feife vpon their Churches, and especially of that of the Franciscan Friers, the which was reasonable faire for the place. But the French Embassadour, having made his complaint to the chiefe Visicr, he prohibited them to make any attempt against the Christians, vpon paine of rigorous punishment. This prohibition staied their fury : but they did not forbeate in all other occasions to shew the cruell hatred they owe unto Christians: so as through all the Leuant, in all encounters where they come, they do a thousand times more mischiefe than the Turks them-

At the same time the Sultan Achmat had drawne together a mighty army to go into Tran-The Turks are fyluania, he caused it to campe in tents neere vnto Constantinople, about his palace called my for Transfer and the cause of the cause Darut Bassa, whither the people of Constantinople went to walke, and to see his forces: with. in few daies after, he went to Hadrianople; meaning from thence to proceed in his voyage, carrying with him all the chiefe men of his Port, except the Baffa of the fea, or Admirall, who remained at Constantinople, to haue a care of the city. And for the greater fafety thereof, this Baffa caused an edict to be published, That no man should go out of his house, nor keep any light in it after the ordinary cry, which is made an houre within night, when as the Talifmans crying from the tops of their Mosques, inuite the people to make the Sala, or prayer. After the publication of this ordinance, he sent certaine Chiaux to entreat all the Embassa-E dours residing at the Port, not to suffer their people to goe out by night, to the end that their liberty might not serue as a dangerous example to others. But notwithstanding all the Basfacs entreaties and prohibitions, three Englishmen of the Embassadours traine, went out by night into the fireet, where they were met by the Prouoft of Pera, who tooke them, and prefently (without respect of the quality) caused either of them to have an hundred and fifty blows with a cudgell, and then committed them to prison, the dores whereof are neuer opened but with a filuer key : fo strictly do they obserue in Turky the orders of the Princes Lieutenants, without exception of Persons. About the end of the yeare, the Patriarch of Constantinople (by reason of divers complaints made against him) was depriuen by the Grand Visier, and one Cyrillm, Patriarch of F Alexandria, (a learned and religious Bishop) was (much against his will) preferred to the place. The former Patriarch hereupon excommunicated all fuch as had wrought his ouerthrow; but he himselfe was banished into the Isle of Rhodes. In his passage, the barke wherin

he went was cast voon Mytilene, in which place he renounced all right and claime to the Pa. G triarchthip before the Bishop of that place, and resigned it to the Bishop of Patras: where upon the Bishop came from Patras, to Constantinople, and laboured with the Visier Nasian for the place: who vpon promise to pay him fifteene thousand Chequines (which is tenthous fand more than they were wont to pay) made him a Grant thereof: which Cyrillus the late elected Patriarch vnderstanding, he came with all the Grecians to expostulate the businesse with the Grand Visier: Who answered, That he was to do what he could for the Emperous profit, and nothing against it; wherefore if they would give so much as the other had promifed, Cyrillus (hould continue in the place. Which the people were very willing to performe; but Cyrellow refused it, and so the other was made Patriarch: who presently sent for the old Patriarch to come from Rhodes to make peace with him, for that they held not his excom. H munication just, being not deprived by a Councell, but only by the King. About the same time, Naffuf the Grand Visier sent for the source Embassadors, of England, France, Venice, and the States of the Low-Countries; and the reason why he sent for them was, to raise their cuflome on the hundred more than the Merchants had formerly payd.

The enterprise Dake of Tafea-

Whilest that the Sultan Achmats Army drew neeresto Transylvania, and fortified the places which hee held in those Countries, Cosmo de Medicis Great Duke of Tuscany bent his generous designes against the Fort of Agliman in Caramania, in old time called Cilicia a Province which in the writings of Antients hath beene honoured with two famous Cities. that is to fay, Tharfis the Countrey of Saint Paul, and Seleucia, the Fort and Port whereof is called Agliman, a hauen which in old time hath continued within it's bosome the fearefull forces of the Pyrats of those daies: from thence in former times hath come forth a powerfull army of pyrats with a thousand sayle, so proudly rigged as many of them had their sayles of purple, the tackling of gold thred, and the oares garnished with filuer, markes of the spoiles of aboue foure hundred cities ruined by those pyrats, who stroke a terrour even to the Romans, and forced them, to avoid their fury, to fet to fea that great fleet whereof Pompey the Great

In the end of March K this present yeare 1613, he armed six Gallies under the command of the Admirall Inghirami, the which hee manned with fix companies of foot commanded by Talio de Conty, called Montano, Generall at land, besides forty Knights of the Order of S. Stephen, and a good number of Gentlemen aduenturers, among the which was Don Petro de Medicis. This fleet parted from Ligorne, and came to Ciuita Vecchia in the beginning of Aprill they tooke in many Noblemen and Gentlemen of France, which attended them, and would be partakers in the enterprise; the which were the Earle of Candale, eldest some to the Duke of Espernon, Cipierre, Themines, De Vic, Monterrault, De la Tour, and his brother Boifiere, Villandre, Vernegue, Du Plesis Deala Motte magnus, Auenes, Del Tour, Sainof Cyre, Monplaisir, and Loyres. About the middeft of Aprill the gallies landed in the night neergy nto a little towne in Afia the leffe, I called Icronda, held for that Geronda of the Antients : but their difcent was fruitlesse, they found it defart by the flight of the Inhabitants who had prevented all surprises. They returned againe to their gallies, and failing towards the East, they encountred three vessels like vnto their Caramoussals, the which they set upon and tooke: and about the sisteenth of May, having scoured the Leuant seas, they resolved to extempt Agliman. Vpon the way they took a Vessell called Grippe, which instructed them of the estate of the Fortresse: they vaderstood there were two Gallies of Cyprus in the Port, that the place was well furnished with all things necessary, and guarded without by a good number of horsemen, and that within few daires after, one of the faid gallies should comeout of the Port of Agliman, and go to the Island of Papadula, to fetch a new mast, Inghirami thought to prevent it, carrying his M whole fleet thither, the which he layd close in the Island to susptife the Turkish Galley; but it having discovered his fleet, put out to sea, and with speed neturned to the Port of Agliman;

A togice the alarme vnto the country. Notwithstanding the Christians resoluted to assault it, they went with their fleet to the port Caualier, twelve miles from Agliman, from whence they fent a long boat to discouer: the which brings them word that the whole country was inarmes. These newes might well have danted the courages of some that had been lesse ge. These relians nerous; yet they passe on and about three of the clocke in the morning they came neere the man, shore, being concred with the silence of the night, so as before six of the clocke they had made their landing about a mile and a halfe from the port. The Seignior of Montano and the Earle Candale with some few choice men landed first, to discouer: a mile from the thore they encountered the Turkish horsemen, yet not with standing Montano commanded they should finish their landing, leaving twenty men for the guard of every gally.

This fort of Agliman is scated vponalittle pleasant hill, which looks towards the South: The description It extends from the hill vnto the fea shore : the forme is ouall; that part which is next to the of Agiiman. Sea is altogether Meridionall, and the other which rifethyp to the top of the hill, lookes towards the North. The wals are built of good flone and lime, the which are fine faddome high, and one broad. Within there was a wall drawne from the East to the West, which diuides it into two vnequall parts, the which they enter by a port fet in the midft. The circuite of the wall is fortified with eight towers, whereof fine be whole, and three are but halfe towers: those which be whole are of a square forme, and have five saddome in breadth on either side: the halfe towers have the same greatnesse on the one side, and halfe as much on the other; their height exceeds not the wall, valeffe it be that which is built on the top of the hill, a which is raifed aboue eight foot aboue the wall. Within the place were aboue three hundred fighting men, with flore of victuals, munition for war, and many pieces of ordnance: without, there were an hundred horse seouring vp and downe for the sasegard of the place; and within the port there were two gallies, a Caramoufall, and a Greeke Brigandine, with some hundred and fifty fighting men. The order of the combat was divided after this manner, by the Seignior Montano Generall at land : for the principall port, and that of the retreat, he fent two companies of foor, which were those of the Admirals gally, of the captains gally, and of Saint Stephen, with the petards, all under the charge of the Earle of Candale, who leading this forward, discoucred a Corps de gard of Turks, horse and foot together: whereof he presently aduertifed the Generall, fending him word that he would march on towards the fort, and if the Turks came to charge him, he would cut them all in pieces. Many adulfed him to returne to the gallies: but Montano allowed the resolution of the Earle of Candale, who past on without charge until he came within an hundred and twenty paces of the wall, where he was charged before by the musket thot of the fort, behinde by the gallies, and in flanke by them of the mountaine, with such horrible howling and crying out, as the mariners which carried the Petards being wonderfully amazed and terrified, let them fall to the ground and fled away. The Baron of Mont-terault, and Tiel, a fouldier of Langueza tooke them vp. They continued their way untill they came within fifteene paces of the walls, when as twenty Turks fallyed forth with a snew to make head against the earle of Candales troups; but seeing themselves too weake, they fled presently backe againe into the towne. The Earle advanced to enter with E them, but the port was so soone thut as they were in wherefore they must of force set the Petard to worke. But whilest they were making it fast vnto the gate, there fell a showre of great stones voon the troupe, wherewith Don Pedro de Medicis (who would needs bee prefent) was ouerthrowne and halfe flaine; Callonge, Mont terault, La Tour, Dananes, and Deltour had taken upon them the charge of the Petard, enery one carrying a part, to put it speedily in execution.

Whilest they were thus busied to force the Port, the Sergeant Major came vnto the Earle The Twelstown of Candale and told him, that there was a troupe of three hundred musketiers come to charge from their rate of Candale and told him, that there was a troupe of three hundred musketiers come to charge first to charge him: these were two Beyes which came out of the gallies with their troups, by reason of the the chief exist bad guard which the two companies that Montano had left to hinder their landing, had F kept. The Earle of Candale had left part of his troupe with the Petard, and turned head with the rest against these Beyes to charge them; but they had no meaning to fight, but onely to make a shew, and seeing they should be forced if they staied longer, they tooke their way towards the mountaine, and in their retreat made many thot. The Christians pursued them not, holding it fitter to returne to the Petard, the which plaied so happily, as it made a breach G

The fquadron of the Knights of S. Stephen, commanded by the Commissary Lenzani, and the company of the gallie of S. Mary Magdalen, with two ladders were to affault the high tow. er. The company of the Admirall gally with one ladder, had charge to force the Port of the retreat; and the company of the Gally S. lean was to fight with the gallies and veffels in the hauen: all these troups (being led by the Generall Montano, and by Captaine Alexander of Tarentum, Sargeant Major) marched in order towards the fort. But the petard having effected as we have faid, the Earle of Candale entered first with all his troup, and suddenly ranvntothe port of the retreat, there to apply a petard, the which also very fortunately made a breach. The Turks amazed at the noise and forcing of their gates, fled vnto their walls; some retiring into H their towers and others into the barricadoes which they had made in the firect. At the same instant they planted two ladders on the lower part of the towne somewhat neere adjoyning to the sea, whereof one was broken with the losse of them that were vpon it: by the other (notwithstanding that the Turks horsemen charged them behind) a good number of Christians got up to the wals, making their way by their arms, whilest that the rest put the Turks to route having taken their Cornet, they forced the rest for to flee vnto the mountaines. The squadron of Knights with the company of the gallie of Saint Mary, having had a longer way to march, came not to the tower vpon the hill, vntill that after the petards had wrought theireffects : fo as the Turks being retired thither, they found very great resistance, besides the attempts of the enemies horse which charged them behinde; thrice they planted their ladders against the wall, and could not make them hold. Wherefore the Commissary Lanzoni, ha. uing performed as much as a braue and refolute man could doe in that extremity, refolued to leaue that place, and go to some other where he might be more necessary : but being the last to make the retreat, hee was shot through with two musket bullets, and suddenly slaine. The company of the gally S. lohn, vanquithed the two gallies in the port, whereof Inghirami the Admirall at Scawent to take possession as soone as they had given him a signe, having the other two vessels at liberty.

Within the fort in the towers, and at the barricadoes, the combat was hot and dangerous bat within the the Turks had despaire and the advantage of the place on their fides. The Christians thrust on by their valour and constant resolution, prest them on all sides; there was nothing tobe w feene but bloud, wounded, or dead men : but much more of the Turks side than of the Christians. In the end after a combat of foure houres, the Turks fainted, somewere taken, many The Christians were slaine, and the Christians obtained an absolute victory: but as it could not bee made get the villary- without loffe of their enemies, who made great refistance : so there were fine and fifty Christians wounded, of which number De Vic a French Gentleman was one, who had a musket shot through his thigh, going to charge a troupe of Turks which were retired into atomet: and some Gentlemen were slaine; amongst the which was young Boisierre, a French-man, whose valour in this action made them that saw him fight so generously, conceiue a certaine hope that hee would have prooued a valiant Captaine, if Heaven had lent him longer life. The forrow for his death was generall; as well among the Italian troupes, as among those I of his owne Nation. Vernegue and Villandre, two other braue French Gentlemen were also slaine. The dead and wounded were carried vnto their Gallies: they emptied the Fort of all the Artillery, munition for warre, and victuals; the trophy of forty Florentines heads was beaten downe and all the houses set on fire. Agliman beeing thus ruined, they shipped their booty, with three hundred and fifey Turkish slaves, having freed about two hundred and forty Christians which were in yrons. The two Turkish Gallies were drawneout of the Port, and carried away with eight other veffels. In this triumph as the Admirall Inghirami bent his course towards Ligorne; vpon the way a Turkish Caramousall came into the middest of the fleet, as into a toyle: It prepared to defend it selfe, the patrons gally inucsted it, but not without losse; for the Turks made so great resistance, as there were about sources M Christians hurt or slaine; the Earle of Candale fighting alone at the prow of the Gally, by the permission of the Generall. But this Caramousall being taken, and the Florentine marriners entered, it split and funke suddenly. The great Dukes gallies encountered someother

A finaller vessels, the which they tooke, and afterwards arrived happily at their Port.

The twelfth of August following, Octavio of Arragon Generall of the gallies of Sicily, by The Property the commandement of the Duke of Offunna, Viceroy in that Realme, parted from the hauen she gette of Delarmo, with high reallies well armed and manual account of the parted from the hauen she gifts in the of Palermo, with eight gallies well armed and manned, to faile into the Leuant. His first Leuant. touch was vpon the Island of Cerigo, where he understood that the Admirall Bassa of the sea was gone from Constantinople with thirty gallies, bending his course to the Island of Negropont, whereas fixty others attended him in the hauen; and moreouer, that the gallies of Rho les prepared to goe and joyne with him, all which Nauall fleet was to fall voon Soria, Notwithstanding these news, Octaula continues his course vnto the Island of Nicaria, where They see you he understood by a Greeke vessell, that the Turkish Admirall meant to send twelve gallies to Rhodes, to guard certaine vessels of the sleet, which came from Alexandria by the Channell of Samos. True it is, that of twelue which were together when they parted, two were fent by the Bey or Captaine which commanded them; into the Island of Chio, foas there remained but ten together. Octanio resolued to charge these ten, causing his fleet to row that day, and almost a whole night as secretly as they could, along the shore of the strine land of Natolia, and at the breake of day hee arrived at the cape of Corno, twenty miles from Chio; from whence hee sent his song boat to discouer. But in the meane time he himselfe espied the ten Turkish gallies not far from him; at fight whereof he ordred his gallies for battell, with such diligence, as at Sun rifing he was about the enemies gallies, and had inuefled them. At his first C approch he discharged all his ordnance, and then with his Admirall gally he joyned with the Turks gally which carried the standard; the Spaniards entered, slew and massacred all that made refistance: the combat began at the prow, from whence they went to the poope, whereas the Bey or Commander of the tengallies stood, whom they forced to yeeld. In the meane time the other gallies of Sicily charged the Turks fo furioufly, as they tooke fine, all great vessels carrying lanthornes; two fled towards the land, hoping to faue themselues, but the Turks had fearee leifure to leape to land, and to fly into the country, abandoning their veffels to the Spaniards, who purfued them 3 the other three gallies having gotten fonie advantage escaped by flight: so seuen only came into the Spaniards power, in the which they had a very rich booty, freeing aboue a thousand Christian slaves, which were at the chaine, and by a D strange change of fortune, putting into their places the Turks which had inchained them. Among the most remarkeable of the prisoners, were the commander of the tengallies called Sinan Bey of Grigna in the Island of Cyprus; the Bey of Alexandria (sonne to Piall Buffa, who was defeated in the battell of Lepanto, by Don Iohn of Austria) and some Raise or Captaines, and Patrons of gallies.

This Summer the Emperor Mattheas being gone to an affembly of the States at Presburg Sigifmund national in Hungary, in the meane time Sigismund Battori, who had beene Prince of Transylvania, and tors Prince of fogreat a terrour and scourge vnto the Turks, as hee made Sinan Bassa, having an army of one dies at Progres. handred and fifty thousand men, to fly thrice within ten daies from before him, and would neuer endure the fight of him, hee having but forty thousand men in his army. But after-E wards being the author of his owne misfortunes and miseries, by his inconstant humours, he came and lived a privat life at Prague, and there died of an Apoplexie. The Estates assembled at Presburg, consulted of the fortifying of their Frontier towns, and manning them with good garrisons, knowing the infidelity of the Turks, and doubting that they would not obferue the truce. But there was some question in the assembly, touching the admissions of Germans into their garrisons: for that the Hungarians maintained they had a decree to the contrary; and yet they could not defend themselves without the affishance of Germanes: but in the end it was concluded, that the Germans should be admitted equally with the Hungarians into their garrifons, but all other strange souldiers should be excluded. The Turks in the meane time had burnt and spoiled many villages in Hungary and Transylvania, carried F away many Christians captine, and committed many other acts of hostility, so as all men feared a new warre in Hungary; but by the providence of God it was diverted. For Suftan Achmat marching towards Transylvania with a mighty Army, hearing voon the way that Bublem Gabor was acknowledged Prince, under his protection, he tutned head towards Constantinople. But rather for the affaires of Asia, whereas the Rebels of Natolia had spoiled G and burnt many places, and a certaine Arabian had revolted against him, and vsurped the title of King, having drawne unto his party fifty thousand Rebels, the which did ouerrun and fpoyle the Countrey which yeelded obedience vnto him, threatening his Dominions with greater ruine. Moreouer, the Portugals and Spaniards had made many incursions with a places joyning to the Red Sea, and had taken and spoiled Aden, a place of importance: so as all these disorders hastened his returne into Thrace, to fend forces against his Turkish Rebels. A great Player and his Spanish enemics. But approching neere vnto the Imperial city of Constantinople. in Configuration the Plague was so violent, as hee staied at Adrianople vntill the end of this yeare, when as that horrible contagion ceased. Hee then came vnto the City, whereas he made a very state. Iventry before him there marched his ordinary guard of fine and twenty or thirty thousand H Ianizaries, all the Bassaes of the Court following him in very great pompe, and before him there marched on horsebacke two of his sonnes, the pillars and hope of his affaires, the eldest beeing about seuen or eight yeares old. Passing before the Mosques, the Talismans or Priests of his law, made sacrifices in his presence for his prosperity, they sew sheepe and ox. en voon Altars erected for that purpose, then they cut them in pieces, and gaue them voto the people.

The Grand Seigniour beeing returned to Constantinople after the great Plague, norwithstanding the Turkes hold a firme opinion of Predestination, and that they shall not die besore their appointed time, and that the time of their death is written in their soreheads, yet apprehending the infection, by the aduice of some about him, hee commanded 1 all the dogges in the City of Constantinople, to be transported vnto Scutary in Afia (a fini ant of Con. Towne antiently called Chrisopolis) and for the due execution thereof, every housholder was to bring in his dogge first to the Cadi (which is the Iudge of the place) and to receive from him a Tulcany or Ticket for his passage, or else hee was to pay soure Chequines; by which meanes there were transported to the number of fifty thousand dogges. The reason of his sending them away, was, for that reading the Acts of his sather, hee found that thirty yeares before, hee had fent away all the dogges for feare of the infection. The Sultan commanded allowance of bread and flesh to be carried every day to sustaine them, which not susficing, the inhabitants were much oppressed, and ready to fall into mutiny; but by the aduice of his Muphti, they were at length transported from thence to an Island that was not k inhabited, some sixteene miles from Constantinople, where they all perished. Before their fending away, the Grand Seigniour had propounded to his Muphti, to have themall flaine: who made answere, That every dogge had a soule, and therefore it was not fit to kill them.

The care of the Turks to win men to their

The Turkes are wonderfull glad when they win any one to their Religion, and feekeby all meanes to seduce them either by force or by faire persuasions; whereof you may see an affured proofe, by a Icw, who being turned Turke, soone after buying of grapes of another Turke, fell at variance with him about the weighing of his grapes: from words they fell to blowes, and the Iew-Turke beat the other, which hee endured very patiently to encourage him as it seemed in his new Religion. Soone after, another Iew came to the Turke who had L beene beaten, and demanded of him why hee had suffered himselfe to be so abused ? Who answered, You shall beat me as much as you will, turne Musulman: so zealous they are towinne Proselites.

This yeare in October, the Turks observing their feasts of Bairan (which is our Easter) the which they observe twice a yeare; a Turke having drunke Wine too freely (thedrinking whereof is forbidden among ft them, although they loue it well, and drinke in private) was apprehended, and carried before the Grand Visier: who seeing the fact verified, inslicted this punishment upon him, to have boyled lead powred into his mouth and eares, the which was speedily executed.

Bethlem Gaber as you have heard was feated quietly in the Principality of Transyl. M uania, the Sultan supported him, and had sent Sarder Bassa with an Army against Gabriel Bastors who was then in possession; but weake both of men, money, and friends, hee was not able to make head against them; so as beeing abandoned of his friends, and hated of his fubicas.

sublects for his tyrannie, the grew into despaire, and was slaine by his owne souldiers. Whereupon the countrey yeelding obedience to Gabor, Sarder Baffa retired out of Transylvania with his Turks. Yet afterwards, some neerly allyed to Bastori (desiting to reuenge his death) caufed some alterations; and others seeking to get a Province from the Emperour, had surprifed Hust and other places in his name. The Sultan hearing this, wrote his Letters to the Noblemen and States of the Province. They were not ignorant he faid, that fince the time that Transyluania yeelded obedience to his predecessors and him, they had alwaies lived in peace vnder his protection, and had often defired and obtained fuccour against their enemies. That when as Bosfean had been annoted by the Germans, affilting him with great forces, he had shaked off the yoke: That when as Batteri his successour had lived after his owne will, they sent R Betblens Gaber with complaints to his Court by their generall confent, and did eafily obtaine forces to free the Pioninee from syrannie. Hee being taken away, now a wish: d day began to fhine, the clouds of tribulation being all dispersed : That he had held Bethlem worthy to succeed Batteri) and to enjoy that Prouince. Wherefore he had commanded all the Noblemen to submit themselves vnto him, and to enjoy a wished peace : That Bethlem had sent to aducttife him of the new practifes of the Germans; wherefore he had given charge to the Baffacs of Temeswar and Agria, and to the Prince of Valachia, to be watchfull to repell all these induries; admonishing the Noblemen to yeeld speedy obedience to Bethlem: to which end hee had fent them those letters, that vpon the fight therof they might be admonished of their duties, and if the Germans (hould attempt any thing, they should make resistance till the comming of his forces: and following Bethlem in al things, they should acknowledge him for their true and lawfull Prince, and continue constant in their sidelitie, lest they should prouoke his weath against them, and draw you themselves some great misery : writing much more to the like effect; concluding, That he had fully purposed and resoluted not to spoile any one village or any Fort in Transyluania, nor to do any wrong to any man, nor suffer it to be done by any other, but would defend that Province from all oppression. Wherefore he would have the Emperor aduertised, that if he meant to have the peace inviolably kept, hee should cause the said places of Transylvania to be presently restored vnto the Prince, or signific his mind vnto him by letters. Or these Rebels of Asia, whereof wee have made mention, the Governour of Sarepta or Emir Facardin D Sidon in Syria, called Armill or Emir Facardin, he who gave entrance into his Port to the abandontin Florentines, and received them in their courses to the Levant, hearing that the Bassa of Damas, and the Bassa of the sea, with the gallies which be brought from Constantinople, and the threefcore which he tooke at Negropont (whereof wee haue made mentio) came to fall vpon him with a mighty and fearfull army, hee left his cldest sonne within Sidon with forces to command there, and in other Forts about it, and flying from a furious tempest of enemies. hae went to sta with three ships, to retyre himselse into Europe, with his source wives, ten children, seventy Turks, and sourceme thousand pound weight in gold. Hec arrived at Listorne, and went from thence to Florence, under the protection of Cosmo de Medicia great Duke of Tuscanie, whose hands hee kissed , presenting varo him a Cuttelas very curioufly wrought, and enriched with stone, and two jewels to the great Dutchesse, to the value of fix thousand Crownes. This Turke though hee had no faith, yet he found faith with this Prince of Tuscanie. Cosmo received him, defrayed him and all his traine, furnished him with money, whether it were by way of gratification, or that Emir had confumed his owner and by all kinde of courtefies made this Infidell fee what difference there was to flie vnto the protection of a Christian Prince, or to have recourse vnto a Mahometane. They say that Emir had many goodly overtures for the feeling of the Christians in Asia: but to attempt it with a good and happy successe, it should be necessarie that most of the Christian Princes would ioine their wils and armes together for the generall good of Christendome. It is true, that the great Duke Ferdinand deceased, and Cosmo his successour had made proofe of their good intentions, by many generous enterprises against the Turke. But one Prince alone can-

These things past in the yeare 1613, the end whereof concludes with the fury of terrible Abonible tempests in the Mediterranean sea. the port of Genoa, with a great number of persons which were miserably drowned. Which G losse was valued at about 800000 crowns. The port of Maples was not free from this storm; and the gallies of Malta, with a great number of other world's received great losse.

The grand Signior having this year and the year before sustained great one.

The grand Signior having this year and the year before sustained great offe of his gallies and frigots in the Mediterranian sea, by the gallies of Naples Males, and Fidence; and in the black sea by the Cossacks, who had taken two gallies well manned and richly latten; heenow imposed a great tax upon all his Christian subjects; towards the reparation of that loss is he charged the Armenians to build him nine gallies at their name coss; and the Greeians twenty. Such is the Turks tyrannie, as he suffers not the poore so having any thing but he finds means to pull it from them.

The grand, Visier Nassur held his credit with the Prince: at whose returns from Adriano. He ple, many of the lanizaries (to whom he was very odious) conspired to killhish as hee should enter in at the North gate comming from Adrianople: and had placed themselves there for the effecting of what they had intended: but comming neer the gate, the Sultan (ignorate of what was plotted against the Visier) called for him to speake with him, keeping him by him until he was entred into the city, by which means he escaped the intended practice. Soon after Nassurf invited the Sultan to a sumptuous seast; and within sew daies after the Emperour seasted the Visier; who presuming upon his great credit, caused all the crosses in the Church of S. Sophia (which is one of the goodliest monuments in Constantinople) to be cast downe, and all the images to be defaced: the which had stood entire ever since the Christians Gouernment.

Couclty of the Persian King.

The year before, the King of Persia had put to death 1200 Armenians, upon a salse suggestion as if they had intended to reconcile themselves to the Pope , as bating the Papisti, yet fuffering divers Jesuits to line in his dominions. The English Embassadors Chaplein desiring to know the reason of the Persians cruelty, conferred with the Patriark of the Armenians which refided at Constantinople (for there are two Patriarks, one under the Persian, and the other under the Turk) who told him, that it was true he had miferably flain many of their nation, by the cunning practifes of an Armenian, who had counterfeited letters from the Patriark of Armenia to the Pope by which the Patriark with his whole church of Armenians offe red to reconcile themselves to the Church of Rome, and to acknowledge the Pope for their head; intreating the Pope to write to the king of Persia to give them leave to doe it fieely, K Which letters the Pope receiving he rewarded the messenger bountifully, and returned Len ters by him to the Persian king, wherby he increated him to suffer the Armessians in his comtry to vie their consciences freely. The King of Persia having received these letters, grem into a great rage, causing many of them to be put to death; saying, That if they would be obedient to the Pope, he could expect no fernice nor obedience from them. Although the Papills, fay this was don directly by the Patriark, the Armenians affirm it was the practife of a counterfeit rogue. Soon after there arrived three Embassadors at Constantinople; the one was a Circassadith fecond a Georgian Bishop, and the third; a Mingrelian; all of them complaining of the Perfians oppression and cruelty, and imploring succors from the grand Signior for their support. Presently after there arrived a Persian Embassador, whom the Sultan would not admit to as L dience, until all controuersies were concluded betwixt himself and the Emperour, which wis then in question the Sultan having sent one Gasparo (somerime a servant in the English Em bassadors house) to treat with the Emperors by whose means at length all matters were reconciled betwixt them.

1614. The fail of Nalluf. The year 3614 began by the horror of great prodigies, which were feen in divers parts of Hungary and Silcia. Oues the strong sown of Vienna in Austria, the heavens grew fored and fearfully darkned, as they feared that either the last day was come, or elfe there would follow some horrible effusion of bloud. But all these signes had no other effect this year, but the rune of the fortune and prodigious authoritie of Nasjas Bassa the great Visier of the Turkish Empire; formerly one of the greatest and most seateful enemies which had cariedams Min Asia against the source power of their Sultan. But to comprehend more plainly the fall and declining of his fortune, let vs behold him in his beginning and first sing. Howas the sonne of a Greek Priest, borne in a little village neere vnto Solonica, and having bene taken by the Tribute, which the Turks exact from Christians vpon their miserable children.

A taking one of three 3 hee was carried very young to Constablinople, and there sold for three The beginning Chequines or Sultanines (euery one of which is not aboue eight shillings sterling, to an Eugen on the Sultans, who nourished him and bred him up until hee came to the age of twenty stance, yeares, and afterwards sold him to a steward of the Sultana's house, to ferue him in his charge. Who sinding this slaue to have a spirit capable of greater affaires than the houshold, employed him in the oversight and building of a rich and stately Mosque, which the Sultana caused to be ere deed at her charge. In this place he gave such proofe of his wit and judgement, to the Sultana's content, that soone after she gave him the government of her house-hold.

The Sultan had a will to imploy him in his seruice, and retyred him from the Sultana's R house into his Seraglio, where he was honored with the charge of the Capigi Baffa or Captaine of the Porters or Vihers of the Seraglio I from thence he was advanced to the dignitic of the Bassa of Aleppo, and soone after hee was made gouernour Generall of Mesopotamia. The commodity of his gouernment, frontiring vpon Persia, stirred vp his ambitious thoughts and his difordinate defire to become Soueraign of that countrey, and made him to entertain many practifes with the King of Persia, an antient enemy to his master. The report of his pradises came to Constantinople, the Sultan is aduertifed thereof, he knowes the ambitious and firring spirit of this Nassuf, and findes that he is very profitable for his service, if hee can by any milde course withdraw him from his disloyalties and intelligences with the Persian. Wherefore he diffembled the knowledge of his treacherous defignes, and to gaine him the more powerfully, he gorged his ambitious appetite with the greatest dignitie of his empire. After the death of Murath Buffa hee honoured him with the place of grand Visier, and gave him a great part of his goods, and in his place made him Generall of the army against the Persian, with promise to give him his daughter in mariage. Thus was No ful aduanced by his dexteritie, wit, diligence, and treacherie, to the greatest charges of the greatest Empire of the World.

He entred into Persia as Lieutenant General of his masters Army, with the which he made fogreat a spoile, that he forced Ka Abbas King of Persia then reigning, to demand a peace. And after that he granted him a surcease from armes, he brought his Embassadour to Constantinople, to conclude this peace to his masters benefit, as we have formerly observed. He D enters in pompe, presents a million of gold vnto his Emperor, is wel received at the Seraglio, much made of by the Baffa's, but more by the Sultan, who caused him to marry his daughter. Fortune having thus advanced him to the height of greatnesse, not being possible to climbe higher, the ouerthrowes him and doth precipitate him to the lowest degrees of miserie. The Sultan fears his spirit, too head strong by reason of his ambition, he grows jealous of his actions, and about the end of the year concludes his ruin and death. The commandment is given to Bostangi Bassa, that is to say, the Sultans chiefe gardiner, and overscer of his Scraglio and all his houses, one of the goodliest dignities in the court. Nassuf was at that time sick in his house; Bostangi goes thither to visit him, and to cause him to bee strangled, being accompanied onely with feuen or eight men; for that he would not give any suspicion of the commandement he had received from his mafter. Being come vnto his lodging he demanded to fpeak with him, and Naffuf excused himself by his servants, by reason of the discommodities of his health. But the Boltangi (who would needs execute his commission) replied, That hee could not return to the Sulran (who had fent him to have certain newes of his health) before he had feen him, to be the better affured. At this reply Naffuf grew distrustfull, and would without all doubt have bin far from thence in some place of Melopotamia but beleeving what soeuer hapned to him was ineuitable, he commanded them to fuffer the Bostangi to enter: who at his first approchentertained him with many complements of curtesic; and having demanded some questions of him concerning his health, he drew out of his pocket a commandment from the Sultan to Nassuf, to deliuer voto him the seales of the Empire. The which beeing presently don, he drew out another commandement vnto him, by which hee was injoined to fend him his head. Then Naffuf cried out aloud, and defired to speak with the Sultan ; but the Bollangi answered, That he had no commission to conduct him to the Scraglio, but to c use his life to be taken away prefently. Vpon this refufall hee intreareth him to give him leave XXXXX 2 to wash himselse in the next chamber, to the end that his soule (said he) should not depart G to want miniment in the flate of pollution, according to the Turks beleefe, who hold the washing of the body for a true purification. This fauour was also denied him; hee saw there was no remedy in his misery, nor any hope of grace. Bostangi Bassas followers (which were seven or eight Capigies) being come to take away his life, and enuironing his bed, which was an vindoubted furmons that he must die; in the end hee resolues, and turning himselfe vito these executioners, hee willed them to do their duties: whereupon they fell to worke, and casting themselves vpon him, they put a cord about his necke, and sought to strangle him, but feeing that the fatnesse of his repleat body would not suffer them to take away his life Nelless threat presently, they cut his throat with a knife. His death could not be displeasing to the Chri. ftians, seeing that all his designes tended to their ruine:he had persuaded his Master to breake H the peace with the Emperour, the French King, and the Venerians, promising him to make him fouereign Monarch of the whole world, to the end he might keep his spirit in action, and make himselfe necessarie to his Master, and line more safely in combustions than in a calme; whereas the enuy and malice of his enemies gaue him a thousand furious assaults. Thus Nassuf Bassa ended his dayes and fortune; before Gouernour of Mesopotamia, Generall of an Imperiall army, and Grand Visier of the Turkish Empire, advanced to these supremedignities by the great actions of his mind, but overthrown thamefully to his ruine by his bound. lesse ambition. Doubtlesse it is a difficult thing for a fauorite that is insolently audatious, to continue long in grace with his Prince; especially when his vnrestrained ambition hath once broken the bounds which reason prescribeth to those that Fortune advanceth by the favour I of her blaftes; and that hee followes obstinately that pernitious curiositie to know by experience how high Fortune can advance him : for then the defire to enjoy that which is about his condition, blinding the eyes of reason, he doth precipitate himselfe by his rash and infolent actions, to the lowest step of shamefull ruine. The riches of Nassaf were sogreat and proportionable to his fortune, as after his death they found about two bushels of diamonds and pearles. Doubtleffe this rich and stately spoyle deserved to be enjoyed by some great Prince. So the Emperour Achmat feised thereon, and applyed it to his Chassa, or Treasurie.

Another difcourfe of Naffufi death.

This death of Nassuf is related after another manner by one who was then present in Constantinople, the which I have thought good to set downe as I have received it from him, K The Grand Seignior being much discontented with his Visier, whither insenced with suchas were necre about him, who both hated and feared Neffuf, or doubting his great power; hee diffembled his spleene, vntill he might find some opportunitie for reuenge : yet it was not fo fecretly carried, but Nassuf had discovered the Sultans discontent, and laboured by great gifts both to the Sultana and others to pacific him, prouiding notwithstanding in the meane time for his owne fafety, fending horsemen dayly ouer into Asia, meaning to passe himselse when he had gathered together a sufficient strength. But it fel out on the seuenth day of Osober, it being the Turks Sabbath, that the Moone about eight a clocke at night was mucheclipsed, which made the Turks expect some great accident. The Grand Seigniour having sormerly caused it to be bruited, That hee would about that time passe to visit a new Mosque L which was then in building; whereupon all the fireets were hanged with cloth and array, and as the custome was, a crie went before, that The King commeth; at the noise whereof, Nasjuf (being then in his house) could not but descend to salute the Sultan as he passed by : But it was not the Grand Seigniour himselfe, but his Bostangi Bassa, whom he had caused to be attyred like himselse, who being come before, Nassafr dore, and finding him standing there, hee suddenly leapt vnto him, and told him that the Sultans pleasure was he should deliver vp his seal whetat Nassuff being amazed, demanded what the Sultan meant to do? to whom the Bostangi Basfa replyed, That he knew not what the Princes pleasure was, but if he would not deliver it, he would returne with that meffage vnto him. Whereupon Naffuf drew the scale out of his bosome, and deliucred it. Then the Bostangi Bassa shewed him a warrant for his head, whereunto M he presently submitted himself, and then two Jamoglans strangled him: his head was presently cut off, and carried to the Grand Seigniour, and his body thrown into the freet to be manpled on.

It was thought that his death was procured by the wife of Cicala Bassa of Babylon, who had been manzoled or deposed from his gouernment there by Nas/us, and was a little before returned to Constantinople, but could not be allowed by Nassuf to have any accesse vnto the grand Seigniors presence. Wherupon he wrot a letter vnto the Sultan, wherein hee accused Nassuf to have conspired with the Persian to kill him; charging him with many things that were capitall. This letter he fent by his wife, who was fifter to the grand Seignior, who comming to his speech (although the was watchfully observed by Nassuf who was then present) left the letter in his chamber, and fo departed. The grand Seignior finding this Letter, and reading it, was much insenced against Nassuf, and neuer quiet in mind vntil hee had his head, Hewrites, that there were found in Nassuf's house eighty bags of gold, each bag containing ten R thousand Chequines. After Nassur's death, Mechmet Bassa Admirallat sea (who had married Sultan Achmais eldest daughter) was made chiefe Visier. He was born in the Imperial City of Constantinople, and the first natural! Turk that was euer chiefe Visier since Constantinople was won.

You have heard in the last yeares relation, of some combustions which were growing in Transylvania; and how the Sultan had written his letters of an imperial stile vnto the Nobilitie and States of the Countrey; which letters were fixed up in form of a Mandate thorowout all Transylvania and in places that were neerest vnto those noblemen which held the Emperors party against Betblem. At the same time Betblem deseated certaine troups of the Garrisons at Lippa and Genoa, which ouer-ranne and spoiled the Countrey; so as the governors of those places were forced to fend to Vienna, to demand succors of men and money. A Chiaus arrived at that time at Lintz, bringing letters vnto the Emperor from the grand Seignior: Athmit !: 1-The first point contained in them was, That his Imperial Maiestie should have a care, that terroribe conthe peace made betwirt them for twenty yeares should not be violated; and that for his part he defired to observe it faithfully. 2. That in the name of his Imperial Maiesty they had feifed voon certain places in Transylvania, a Province which had been alwaies under his protection, which received her Princes from his hand, and the which he was bound to defend against all her enemies. 3. That the tyrannie of prince Battors had constrained him to give forces to Bethlem Gabor, to dispossesse him of the principalitie of Transylvania. That after the death of the faid Battors, he had inuested Bethlem to gouern it in peace. 4. That fines, he D had bin advertised how that some troups of souldiers in the name of his Imperial! Maiestic. contrary to the articles of peace concluded betwixt them, had by force feifed upon the forts of Hust and Viuar, and the townes of Nagipan and Tonase. 5. That hee had given charge to Bethlem, not to suffer any enterprise, no not upon the least village of his principalitie; to the end that nothing should be separated, and that he should repel the injury of the aggressor by force. 6. That hee exhorted his Imperial! Maiestie, if hee desired the continuance of the peace, to command his people to make reftitution of the places vfurped; or to fignific his intention by the fame Chiaus which he had fent vnto him, to the end be might be fully affured: for the mischiese increasing daily, the affection which hee bare to the good of peace might grow cold.

The Emperour received this Chiaus at Lintzvery honourably, and gaue him an answer of his Letter, wrapped in a piece of cloath of gold. The sence whereof was, That this businesse being of great importance, his Imperial Maiestie desired to confer with the Princes Electors and States of the empire to heare their aduice: after which he would acquaint him with his last resolution. And finally, That hee should rest affured, that for his part hee would not attempt any thing contrary to the peace. In the meane time there was a petty Warre in Hungary, the incursions and spoiles betwirt the Christians and the Turks beginning the same againe. The Turkes of the garrifon of Agria going forth, rooke a great number of cattel from the Christians. Eight hundred Haiduckes advertised of this spoile, pursued them so specdily, as they ouertooke them before they came within halfe a league of their retreit; when they made them to leave their prize, and put them to flight. The Bassa of Agria advertised of the defeat of his out-riders, goeth forth with a thousand fouldiers, to recover the bootie from the Haiduckes, which they had but newly before taken from his men. But after a sharp incounter, hee loft his horfe and two hundred of his men, and was forced to make his retreir.

From thence the Haiduckes went and spoiled the Countrey about Solnoe: some others hole G ding the waies of Strigonium or Gran, took a Turkish Bride with her baggage, who was go. ing from Gran to Buda; and foure hundred Boot-halers (some of them Haiduckes, and the rest Turkes, men which hold no party but their owne, to robbe with the more impunitie) sei. fed vpon Balaster, Micolut, and Felak: but at the recourse of them they were so ill intrea. ted by the Hungarians, as that most of them lost their lives there, and the rest were taken pri-

But the Emperor, who desired to be resoluted in the important businesse of Transylvania, affem bled the Estates of Bohemia, Austria, Stiria, Carinthia, Carniola, Silesia, Lusatia, Mo. rauia, and Hungarie, his hereditarie countries; whom hee gaue to vnderstand, That the peace was violated in Hungarie by the hostilities of the Turkes vpon the Christians: to whole pre- H iudice Sultan Achmat had subie Red vnto himself the provinces of Valachia, Moldavia, and Transylvania: this last being under the gouernment of Bethlem Gaber, who had made himself his Vaffall. That the Sultan had fent word vnto his Imperial Maiefty, That hee should not pretend any thing there, to the end this countrey might bee wholly vnited vnto the Turkish Empire. Whereupon he earnestly exhorted the affembly to consider wisely: First whether Transyluania should be left wholly in the Turks power: Secondly, why the Sultan would not consent to the ratification of the Truce: Thirdly, of the means to make war, if the necessity of his affairs should force him: Fourthly, to what end the Turke would hinder his Imperiall Maiesty, that he should pretend no right to Transylvania: Fifthly, that the Turke had sent him an Embassador, who contrary to the articles of peace, had not brought any Presents: Sixthly, if 1 they should make a new accord with the Turke, to consider aduisedly, what assurance they might take, feeing that he would not confent vnto the fixth article of the peace, of the Eftates

There opinions were divers upon these propositions; but all iountly consented to maintaine the authoritie of the Imperiall Maiestie. The Hungarians only interessed in their refolutions to warre, by reason of the spoyle of their countrey, as a passage for all their troupes. they befought the Emperour, that if hee meant to fend any forces into Transyluania, they The defignes of might have commandement to march some other way, and not over their lands. Bethlem Beiblim upen Gaber in the meane time laboured to recouer those places which had been lost. Wherefore he provided himselfe to make some attempts upon Lippa, and other places; as at Borene, Genoë, and Arach. The Gouernours of these places gaue aduice vnto Forgats. Lieutenant K Generall to the Emperour in high Hungarie; representing vnto him the estate of their garrifon, and the feare they had, that if Bethlem should once get them into his possession and power, he would deliuer them ouer vnto the Turke: That if they would fend them succors, they would rather endure all extremities than yeeld them to the enemie. Yet for all this, they make no haste to send them succours: and Sander Bassa according to the commandement hee had received from the Sultan, having brought forces to Bethlem, the fiege of Lippa was resolued in the Estates of Transylvania. On the five and twentieth of Osober the Cannon being drawne out of Veradin to batter the Fort; Beshlem went to inuest it, made forces from the his approaches, and battered it so suriously, as having made a reasonable breach, it serued first for a passage for foure hundred men to escape, who left the Gouernour with very L small meanes to defend the place, and without hope of succours from Hungarie; which made him come to a parley, promifing to yeeld the place, to have their lives and goods faued. The Forts of Genoë and Arach, were deliuered by the same capitulation. That these three places should not be put into the Turks hands, but should remaine perpetually vnited to the principalitie of Transylvania: and to take all interest from the Turks, the Estates of the Countrey should pay vinto Sander Bassa the charges and entertainment of his troups. These places thus gotten by Bethlem, he manned them with new garrisons : the Imperials which were within them, being retyred to Forgath the Emperours Lieutenant in high Hungarie. But the Estates of Transyluania being assembled at Veradin, disputed diversly, whether they should resigne these three places into the Sultans power: some represent ted the discontentment hee would have if they were refused, and the inconvenience that might enfue : others were not of opinion that the Province should be so dismembred, gining

the most important places thereos vnto the Insidels. Thus without consenting, or resulting to deliuer these places vnto the Turk, the Estates concluded that prince Bethlem should do therin what he held most necessary for the tranquilitie of the country; beseeching him most humbly to free them from the Imperials, who had feifed vpon Hust and Viuar. Such were the affairs of Transylvania this year; a prouince distracted from the Emperors power by the Turks

At Constantinople, Sultan Achmat being desirous to beautifie the outward part of his The Sultan Seraglio, with a goodly and spacious place upon the sea shore, he caused a platforme to bee forme to bee made within the fea, beeing eight hundred paces long, and one hundred and twenty broad. made at con-The Prouoft of Constantinople caused this his resolution to be proclaimed; when as pre- stantinople, B fently every house sent forth a man, and the chiefe of families themselves laboured there in person. There might you see the Bassa's serue as the ouerscers of the Workmen, and the Ianizaries and Spahies carrying scuttles with a wonderfull alacritie; and at all hours of the day there was musicke of divers forts of infruments to case their labour, and to incourage them to continue. The Visiers going to view the Workemen, caused a largeste of pieces of silver to be cast among them. Thus the Sultan being served with admirable diligence in this his worke of pleasure, hee saw it finished in three moneths, having beene begun in O &ober this

Whilest that the Sultan imployed his leisure after this manner in the structure of a plat. Certain Lighter form within the fea at Constantinople, certain religious men departing from Pera, had a de-liser Cheles. figne to build another in the waves of infidelitic, but more profitable for the health of fouls. This was an imployment of the Iesuites into the countrey of Mingrelia, in old time called Cholcos. Lewis Grangier a priest of this societie, and two others of his order, with an Armenian for their Interpreter, parted from Thrace with this godly resolution, to preach to the people far from God, the truth of his holy Word, and to guide them happily in the way to heauen. He passed the Bosphorus of Thrace, and the famous castles of Leander and Here, and cut thorow those waves, whereas he that could not quench the fire of his passion, quenched the flame of his life : he passed beyond Pompeyes pillar, or rather that of the most happy Daniel Sizlita, who erected his toward the mouth of this sea; and about the fixt of Iune this year they arrived at Verna, a famous town in Thrace; whereas a company of French foldiers (whom the D violence of necessity had some years since forced to leaue the Emperors service in Hungary) were in garrison for the Turke, to defend his subiects against the incursions of the Cossacks: yet thefe Frenchmen do stil obserue the Catholique Religion inniolably. From thence hee failed toward Cordula, and by the incounter of a little gallion he entred into the port of Trabizond. Within few daies after, he was caried in the same vessel to Erissa in the countrey of Laxia or Lassa, which on the one side lookes toward the countrey of Georgia, and the other that of Trabizond. The Christian religion hath bin for a long time planted amongst those people, but very ill manured : for the fathers to free their miserable children from the tribute wherewith the Turkes doe oppresse them, cause their children to be circumcised after the Mahometan manner; and for the same consideration they marry their daughters vnto Ianizaries. Moreouer, they abandon themselues to the Mahometan impietic, to the end they may bedeliuered from their insupportable oppressions, and their Turkish yoke. The Iesuits found there a good subject to worke vpon for the help of soules: during their abode there, for certaine dayes they catechifed the men, baptifed the children, and aduertifed the women married vnto Turks, what they were to do for the maintenance of their faith. But for that their commission or charge was to goe unto Mingrelia or Cholcos, they went agains to sea, and failed towards Gouea, which is the farthest corner of the Black sea. This bauen being verie vnfit to cast anchor in they followed the gallies which caried a Bassa called Oneze from Constantinople, who should treat of a peace on the behalfe of Sultan Achmas with the Prince of the Mingrelians, and dispose him to pay a certain tribute. With these Vessels they went into a port called Macrogalo, nine miles from that of Gouea, holding this place more fafe than the other. But doubtlesse there is very little assurance whereas the waves and windes command foueraigntie. A North-west wind rising about midnight on the fifteenth of September, draue their gallies necrevnto the shelfes and rockes, wheras one was broke and cast The shipments away. This tempest continued many daies, and during the, violence therof another gally was G loft, in which the lesuits had bin, but by good aduice they retired to land during the fury of the sea and winds. The Iesuits imputed the cause of this losse to the prohibition which oneze the Bassa had made vnto them, Not to passe into Mingrelia before the peace was concluded betwixt the Princes of that country, the which grew long, by reason of the difficulties which hapned in the treaty. In the end those princes resoluing to pay the tribute to the Turk, it was concluded.

The libertic of trauel followes peace; Grangier and his Companions proceeded in their journey: twenty daies after they departed from Macrogalo, they arrived at Satrapella, a place of Georgia; wheras the princes Visier came to visit them, and after the Georgian maner saluted them bare headed, and kneeling vpon one knee. Gorel Prince of the Georgians (who was H then at Barlet, wheras the Court was to passe the seast of Christmas) being aduertised of the arrival of these new Christian and French preachers, sent for them, received them savorably. and faluted them bare headed and kneeling. After that he had made them to bleffe his court. he held many discourses with them of the truth of the Roman church, & of the Popes power as Father of all Christendom: being mooued partly thereunto, by a feeling of pietie to the Church, and partly from the instructions he received from the lesuits, so as inlightned with a new beam of the true light, he intreated Grangier to craue absolution of his sinnes from the Pope, the which (faith he) he may give me by the power hee hath from God; promifing to fend him his confession in writing. But understanding that the lesuite had power from the Pope to absolue him, hee purged his conscience of all his fins, by a generall confession of his I life. Without doubt the zeal of these soules, so far from succor, shews plainly what the har. uest would be, if so many labourers were sent as were necessarie. A Monke of Georgia, who had lived at Rome for the space of twelve yeares, had in former time planted pictic there, the which they of this mission did now alter. This Prince Gorel intreated the Iesuits to send him tome of their company at their return into Europe, promifing to make great effeem of them, and to give them a Church, an house, and all things necessarie for their maintenance. The prince offered them filuer, which they refused, modefully excusing themselves you the rules of their institution, which forbids them to receive any temporall recompence for the administration of holy things. Thus they parted from this prince, who commended much their maner of living, and caused them to be conducted to Satrapella, to continue on their journy &

The third of February, in the yeare of our Lord God 1615, they parted from this towne with the Turkes who came to conclude the peace; and passing by the banks of Fasso (a nine which doth water the Countrey of Cholchos, now called Mingrelia) they arrived at Herailcano, otherwise called Heraclea, and from thence they went to Margoula, whereas the Prince of the Mingrelians, called Dodran, then remained, being busie in the reception of Threbis Chan King of Georgia, who was come thither to visit him, being expelled his Country by the king of Persia. The lesuites were brought to kisse the hands of prince Dodran, and of Lipartiabis Vncle, who was Regent for the Realme during the time of his minoritie. They both promifed them affistance in their affairs, sending them to the towne Macaurie, to make their abode L there whilest they were busied in the affaires of their Countries, the which at that time were fomewhat confused. The Bishop of that place entertained them with very great demonstration of loue, and soone after making a feast to Threbis Cham, or Prince of the Georgians, he The Mingrelia would needs have the Issuites assist at this banquet, for a great testimonie of his love. It is ans cugome at the manner of those of Cholchos or the Mingrelians, as well as the Georgians, to sing at their meat. The Threbis Cham desired, that the lesuites might sing some note when it came to their turne, whereof they excused themselves divers times: But there was no remedy, they mak do as others have done: whereupon they fung the hymne of Plange Lingua, &c. appointed to Holy Thursday. Being thus fauourably entertained in Mingrelia, they make their refidence at Mocaury, with hope to labour profitably for the health of foules, whichere in M that countrey through the darkneffe of ignorance, for want of men to teach them the way of truth. They are Christians of the Greeke profession, under the commandement of diuers Princes, alwaies in warre either against the Turke or the Persian: They carry the name

A of Cham, which is as much to fay, as King or Souereigne Prince: The Sophie had disposses Trebis Cham chiefe King of Georgia of all his countries, in the yeare 1613, who had retyred himselse into Mingrelia, as you have heard.

Whilest those men labour to sow the seeds of true doctrine of the Apostles in the soyle The Marie of of Mahometisme, a Turke passing out of Asia, comes into Christendome to seeke the light of beldby many to truth, and demands fauorable affiltance and fuccors from Christian Princes, to enter into the the ampression possession of the Empire, wherunto his birth and the degrees of a lawful succession seemed to the later. cal him by a iust title. The discourse of his birth, of his fortunes, and of his pretensions to the Turkish Empire, is comprehended in this following relation. He termed himselfe the son of Mahomet the third, father to Achmat, now fitting in the Imperial Throne at Conflantinople;

R he maintained, that his father by foure wives or concubines had had foure fons, viz. Mustapha who was strangled, for that he would have dispossessed his father of his kingdom; Jacaia (which was himself) Achmat now reigning, and Ofman: yet it seems by the sequell of the Historic, that he had another Mustapha: that having bin fent for to come out of Magnesia to Constantinople, his mother (who had bin a Christian, and baptised under the name of Hellen, but was afterward ingaged in the company of Mahomet the third, for the worth of her beauty, and knowne in Turky by the name of Sultana Lalpare) could not conduct him to his father, for that he was dangeroully fick of the small pocks. And this Princesse desired much, to find some favorable occasion, wherby the might be freed from the damnable errors of Mahomets law, and return to the wholesome way of the Christian faith, and retyre her sonne Incain faire from the power of e thosebloudy lawes, which sprinckle the Imperiall Scepter of him that comes to the Crowne with the bloud of his brethren, the well forefaw that Incain being but the fecond of Mahomets fonnes, should one day by his death secure the life of Mustapha his elder, and that the onely meanes to preserve him, was to retyrchim into Christendome. Wherefore the laboured serioully in this designe, and made vie of a fauourable fiction; giving it out, that her some Iscaia was dead of the small pockes; and having supposed in his place the son of an Eunuch dead of the same disease, assisted at his funerall, and by her constrained teares subtilly disguised her defigue. An Eunuch called Astam Mehemet was the faithfull secretarie of her enterprise; with him she leaves Magnesia, a Province in Asia, and under pretext to goe unto certain baths there by, shee gets her downe to the sea side, passes into Europe, and transports her son into Mo-D rea, sometimes called Hellespont, and lodgeth him (as vnknowne) in the Bishops Palace in the towne of Miclo. Incain was aboue nine yeares old; the held him not fecure at Miclo, but transported him into Macedonia, under the habit of a Greeke Monke, and retyres him into the towne of Cassandria; where she discouers unto the Archbishop of Thessalonica, a man learned and of a holy life, the qualitie of her fonne, and the defire thee had to make him a Christian: intreating him in charitie to take them both into his protection. This Archbishop lodgeth the mother in the Monasterie of Religious women of our Lady of Thessalonica, and gives the custody of the sonne vnto an Abbot of Saint Michael, a man learned in all Sciences, under whom hee profited wonderfully, as well in the Greeke Tongue as in many goodly ares. I do well know this to be true, for that I have converfed with him for the space of fix moneths, and haue seene him often in the companie of learned men speake the Greeke with as great facilitie as his Turkish and mother tongue. He continued in this Monastery vnder the care and gouernment of this learned Abbot, vntill the age of scuentcene yeares; that is to fay, for the space of eight whole yeares; during which time, his Mothers tears, the holy instructions of the Abbot (but rather the Divine savour) made him to enter into the way of his foules health, and become a Christian. The Archbishop of Thessalonica clensed his soule from the pollutions of the Law of Mahomet, and baptifed him in the Church of Saint Anaffafins, without the City of Theffalonica; yet fecretly, for feare lest the Eunuch comming to discouer this misterie, should abandon him, and publish abroad the place and estate of his folitarie aboad, and so be miserably taken. Thus Iacaia calling himselfe Sulran, being already in some affurace of the Crowne of heaven by the promises of Holy Baptisme, whilest that hee was in the beginning of his pretentions to that of the Turkish Empire, he leaves the Monasterie where hee had been instructed; and in the companie of the Eunuch trauels vp

and down Greece, passing away (in the length and varietie of his voyage) the impariencie of G his age & defires, for that he would not be known he takes whom him the habit and the license of a Dervis or religious Turk. But when he came to the city of Siopia, hee vnderstood of the death of the Emperour Mahomes the third his father, and the rejoycing for the new advancement of Sultan Achmat to the Empire; learning at the same instant, that Mustapha his elder brother had bin strangled by the commandement of his father. The displeasure which hee conceined for that he had not bin bred vp at Constantinople with the reft, to receive fo rich a Crown as that of the Turkish Empire, made him to waver in divers resolutions; somtimes he would go into Persia to have succours from him, and with him to make warre against his brother: fomtime he would ferue for a support and countenance to the Rebels in Asia, and justific their party.

After many discourses with the Bunuch touching his affairs, he sends him vnto the son of Peri Baffa,a Rebell against Achmat : the Eunuch treats for his master, and receives from him the Rebels oath; and returning to Tarlis, where the Sultan Island remained, he conducted him to Peri Baffa, to be the head of his troups. Iacain arrives, and fees himselfe obeyed by anarmy ready to fight; for the Deftarder or Treasurer beeing fent against the rebell Peri, with seven thousand horse, and three thousand soot, was already upon the banks of the river Bardate, icady to giue him battel. The Baffa's troups (being leffe in number of fighting men) went to af. fail him. There was a sharp incounter, but in the end the Defrarder was victor, & the troups of Peri Balla defeated, and Iacaia being wounded in four places of his body, was forced to fane himselse on the other side of the river, where wandring vp and down the fields, hee found relief with a poore countrey peafant, and foone after with an Abbor there by, who entertained him and caused him to be cured; holding him to be one of the Destarders pages, as he him. selfe said.

His wounds being oured, Jacaia returnes again towards Greece, where he finds his mother. conferres with her, and foone after with the Eurweh, of the efface of his affaires, and concludes with both of them, to fend to Constantinople, to the Visier Deruis (who at that time was difcontented with the Emperor Achmat) to found his disposition, and to see if hee might gaine him to his party: The Eunuch undertakes the voyage, he speaks with the Dertis, and finds him disposed to entertaine the offers of Incaia: The conspiracie was concluded, and they sweater kill Achmat, and to fettle Iacaia in the Imperial Throne. Hereupon he transports himselfeto y Constantinople, in a difguised habit: but when as they were ready to execute their enterprise (fay they) the Deruis died be it that the Emperor Achmat had discouered their designe, or otherwife. Thus Iscais being frustrate of his hope to effect any thing by this means, he left the City and fled towards the blacke fea, and then wandred into the countries of Valachia, and Moldauia, following the Carock of a Poland Embassador on foot, vntill be came to the City of Cracouia, whereas Fortune had laid a fnare for him, which brought him in danger of his life; for a Chiaus being come from Constantinople, and knowing him, he defired the King of Poland in his Masters name, to stay him, assuring him that by this meanes he should strictly bring vnto him the affections of Sultan Achmat: the King refused his vniust demand, holding himselfe much honoured to see his Court the refuge of vnsortunate Princes. Afterthis result fal the Chiaus flies to trecherie; he corrupts certaine Tartarians of the Kings guard with money, who promised to murther Insala; and doubtlesse they had performed it, if a Flemish Embroiderer had not advertised him, and lent him his lodging for certain daies to hide himselfo, after which he freed himself from danger, and palt to Prague towards the Emperor Rodalphus who was then lining.

In this Imperial! Court hee found reliefe, and meanes to ease his forepast miseries: The Emperour furnished him with all things necessarie: Hee spent a whole yeare there, and was acknowledged during his abode, by many Turks which came to Prague, for brother to their Emperour Achmat. There wanted nothing but succours to effect his designes : But hee finds nothing but good words and faire withes at Prague; fo as hee was forced to fecke M the effects elsewhere. Certaine Saxons that were his friends, aduised him to passe of Flotence to Ferdinand the great Duke of Tuscanie : hee takes directions from that Princes

Embaffador residing at Prague, and goes on his journy thus entring into Italy, he heares that Ferdinandwas dead; chefe moumfull news made him to resolue to seeke some other place, if Colmo fuccoffor to Ferdinand, and the great Ducheffe his mother, had not called him backe. He came then to Florence, where he was honotably entertained, and lodged for the fafety of his person in the Fort of S. John; where he was supplied with all sorts of commodities. The great Dake Cofine gave him the ticlo of Excellencie, appointed him horses and caroches, and fuch companie as he delighted in, for the pleasure of hunting. He had not staid long at Florence, bunho faw himselfe affisted with such forces as he defired. The great Duke Cofmo caufed his gallions to be armed, fending them into the Leuant, vider the command of the knight Beauregard; where hee had conference with Naffuf Baffa, at that time chiefe of the Rebels of B Affa, Hie offices him men; armes; any money, if he would come to land, and march towards Persta, whither many Rubels were retyred. But he who commanded the Florentine gallions, had so commission to leave him in the hands of Massis wherefore hee carried him backe to Flo-

During the time that lacaia was aboord the gallions, the great Duke fent divers persons into many parts of the Leuant, to informethomfelues carefully of the lethings which he had deliuered, not onely touching his owne person, but also of his Mother; and they all brought backe certaine proofes of the truth of his discourses. This gaue the great Duke subie & to impart this faire occasion vnto Spaine, to labour for the common good of Christendome: He wrote vnto the Catholique King; and informed him of the quality of Incain; to the end that C contributing succours to his personage, they might undertake some happy enterprise against the Turke. The King of Spaine was content he should be fent to Naples : commanding the Viceroy to give him a reception fit for his quality. Iacaia went on his journy, being accompanied by some, by the great Dukes commandement: but according to the newes which he receitted from Naples, he staid at Auerso, where he was recoitted by the Gouernour with much honour. The Viceroy came to visit him, gaue him the right hand, and the title of Excellency. But as the councell of Spaine was tedious in their refolutions, and delayed too long (as Lacaid supposed) the succours which he expected; hee parted from Auerso to go to Millan, and from thence in a difguiled habit past again into the Levant, to found their wils that might advance his pretentions, and bring them to a happy endibut he prevailed as little as he had don before. D Besides all'these voyages which we have described, to the end he might leave no means vnattempted to advance his affaires, he went to Rome to kisse his Holinesse fect. Cardinal! Bellar. mine received him; gaue him the right hand, and the title of Excellencie: the Pope afford him of his affection and fuccors, but it was necessary the fecular powers should begin to levy men. and make the first ouerture towar.

Since we have seene him at France and at Paris, under the protection of the Duke of Neuers, entertained by the bounty of this Prince, and affifted by his Councell: and doubtleffe if the troublestime combustions of a whill war had not diverted the armies of this duke we had feen some happy successe of the affairs which he treated in Loraine, Germany, and other places, to the ruine of the Burks, and the good of Christendome. Finally, as for this Turke called lacata, terming himfelfe eldeft brother to the Emperor Achmat now reigning at Constantinople, and for such acknowledged by many : yet some affirme (yea such as have converted in the East) that Sultan Mabbinet had but three fons, which were Mustaphia, Achimin and Ofman : Notwithflanding it is hard to discouer in this personage any signes of an imposture! I have often frequenced with him, and carefully observed his carriage and actions and have alwaies noted in him a carriage and mindebotne to great matters. This is all that wee could learne of this into be Burner of the 21:15

Stephano Or Tomfho, of whom we have made mention in the yeare 1814, habing overentown Typannies Constantine the lawfull Prince, and made himselfe Vayuod of Moldania, by the support and support tyrannie of the Turke, as he held it by viurpation, without any just title, so he governed with all cruelty and inhumanitie, preferring crueltie before elemencie, and imitating that tyrant. who faid openly. That herespected not the loue of bis subiects, so as they fewed him. Buen to this Stephane at his first entrance plotted how hee might root out all the Noblemen in the Country, whom in their language they call Boyers, with all others of credit and authoritie in the countrey, both for that they supported Confentine, an for the jealousie he had of them, G being best able to resist his tyrannous designes, being also the common disposition of such as viurge any effate by wicked practifes, to be alwaies in fearero be dispossessed, and to been. treated according to their merits. He began first with the Lord of Boracan brother to the Prince flewidow to teremy, whom he caused with two others of the chiefe Noblemen to be milerably and inhumanely empailed as if they had been two notable thesus and minderes; and not content herewith, soone after, hee caused threescore and fifteene Boyers to be appre hended, cutting off all their heads, and would not pardon any one, notwich flanding the great inflaure that was made by their kinsfolkes, charging them with the orime of treafon, as it they had conspired against his person, having no proofe at all a but these blactuelties did nothing daunt the Boyers, as Stephano had perfuaded himfelfe; but contrariwife they were the more in. H fenced, and many of them tooke, armes openly, and had then feifed vpon him, bin revenged of his cruelties, and fet their country at liberty (which had not been ruined as it was afterwards) if he had not bin affisted by the Citisens of Yas; whom he conjured to second him in this oc. casion, promising them immunities of all subsidies: In regard of which promise, these poore wretches preferring their privat profit before their publique fafety, imploied themselves in the service of this tyrant, and fought valiantly against the Boyers, who were come to assault him in the City of Yas, But finding that he was better affifted than they expected, after some light skirmish they retyred as well as they could, whereof many were taken prisoners, whom the tyrant caused to be slain in cold bloud, or empailed to terrisse therest.

The Boyers which escaped from this descap, knowing that there was no hope of mercy in 1 Stephano, who was full of teuenge; nor by confequence any fafety in Moldania during his gouernment, they resolved to have recourse vino the Princoffe (widow to deremy) who had fled into Polonia when as the received news of the asking of ber some Constantine. This Princesse understanding from the Boyers of the tyrannous government of Stephane, and that most of the Moldanians were resolved to shake off the yoke of his tyranny, and defired to have prince Alexander in his place, remembring the good viage they had received from the deceived Prince Ieremy his father. These considerations, together with a desire of command under her fonne (who was then but fixteen yeares old) were strong motives to persuade both her and her fonne to imbrace this occasion, the which they imparted to Prince Vifineuikie some in law to the Princesse, and to Prince Coresky, who at that time aspired to marry her yongest daughter: K These Princes not only allowed of this designe, but they offered themselves willingly toaccompanie, Prince Alexander into Moldauia, and to take the whole care of his army. This refolution being taken, they presently imploied all their credit to leuy men, and had within less than two months drawn together ten or twelue thou fand foot and horse, Polonians, Cossacks, and Transylvanians: whereof the Vayuod Stephane being advertised, he presently levied what forces he could, of Moldanians, Tartarians and Valachians, having drawne together an army of almost 20000 men, which hee kept about Yas, and there resolved to attend the Prince of างปฏิวัติ และ เมษาโดยกัก การ์ปการ ป

Prince Alexander making some stay with his army at Gochina in the years 1615, M aduanced towards. Yas, and being come within halfe a daids journey, he fent fortheight hundred Coffackes (chosen out of a great number) to discover the countenance of his vnemies army thut they were not farre advanced, before they encountred a god: Tarranians, fent by

A Stephano to give some charge to the Polonians. Although the Cossackes were sewer in number, yet finding the Tartarians in diforder, they charged them fo refolutely as they defeated a great part, and put the rest to rout. After which exploit they brought word to Prince Alexander, that Stephano's army might be about the number of fifteen thousand men; but they were fuch as were gathered up in the country, and not trained up to armes, who were rather drawne to it by constraint than of their free will, and therefore were not much to be feared. This hapby successe, together with the report made by the Cossackes, did greatly encourage Alexanders army, being also much insenced against Stephano for certaine letters which he had written to their Prince, full of threats, as if both he and they had been already at his mercy, the which did the more encourage the Polonians, and made them resolute rather to die fighting, than to fall into the hands of this cruell tyrant. The same day there came certain deputies of the Moldanians to Prince Alexander, without the privity of Stephano, to know what his defiguewas, and to intreat him to take pitty of Moldania, which was threatned with a speedy ruine, if the war continued any longer: to whom the Prince made answer, That his intent was not to oppresse Moldania, but to free it from the tyranny of Stephano; that he had beene inuited by a great number of the Boyers, who had come vnto him into Polonia to that end, and had given him affurance, that it was the common defire of the Moldauians. That you this confidence he had marched with what forces he could draw together, and that if he did prevaile in his defignes (as be affured himfelf with their affiftance) he would gouerne them with no leffe mildnesse than his father Prince Ierem, had done, whose sonne and lawfull successour he was. The c deputies returned well fatisfied with this answer, and having published it in divers places, many Moldauians came and joyned with the Prince his army, and affitted him faithfully in this

In O & ober Prince Alexander advancing about three leagues with his army, hee made a fland in a faire Champion where there were good Springs to refresh them, and in the meane time he called a Councell at warre, to resolue what course he should take, and when he should draw the enemy to fight. In the meane time he had fent a troupe of Coffackes to discouer the army who brought word that they were ranged in battell, and that they had twenty cannons ready in front, the which did not much amaze Prince Alexander, for that fome daies before, the Generall of Stephano's artillery had fent to affure him, that if he gaue battell, he would The General D annoy his men as little as he could, having a defire to ferue the Prince, and by this meanes be of Stephane's reuenged of Stophano, who had caused his brother in lawes head to be cut off, vpon a falle suf- files to bepect which he had conceived against him being innocent. The which should teach Princes, tray him, that nothing doth procure them more secret enemies than cruelty, and that at one time or other they in whom they most rely abandon them when as they least expect it. The Vayuod Stephano meaning to make a fecond discovery of the Princes army, sent 1200 Tattarians, and two or three hundred Moldanians, who being scene a far off (for that it was in a plaine champaine) the Prince fent 500 Coffacks with 400 Polonian lances to encounter them: The Tartarians perceiving it, made a shew at the first as if they would retire, to draw them by little and little from the campe; and being about a league off, they made a stand, thinking that they E durst not charge them : but they were soone deceived, for the Polonians fell vpon the Tartarians with fuch fury, as they ouerthrew them, and flew most of them, so as there escaped not aboue fine or fix hundred, who retyring to their campe caused a great amasement. The Princes army was much encouraged by this exploit, and increased daily in number, as it is viuall in ciuill war to follow that party which hath the first advanced.

Presently after this execution, the Prince meaning to advance his army towards the encmies campe, his forewardnesse was staied by a battalion of one thousand horse, who had the night before feifed upon a narrow passage, betwixt a poole and a marish, by the which they knew the Polonian army must passe: but this obstacle was soone taken away, by the aduice which was given by certaine Moldanians, to fend a company of horsemen by a way vnknown F to the enemy, by which meanes they might furprise them behinde, before they should be difcouered. The execution of this stratagem was given to the Cossackes, who speedily went, being guided by certaine Moldauians who comming within fifty paces of the enemy vndiscouered, they charged them, and were seconded so fitly by the foreward, that staid on the Prince Alexander having happily opened this passage, he advanced with his army within cannon shot of Stephano's campe. Prince Visinouiskie was of opinion, that they should make kinde of inclosure with their carts, which might serue them as a fort, having no place of retreat within ten leagues; the which being discouered by Stephano, hee shot certaine vollies of cannon through their fort, so as there were some souldiers slaine, and some hurt; and the Prince answered him with the like, but to small effect, for that night surprised them, neither had they aboue eight small pieces. Prince Visnouiskie spent the night to encourage his fouldiers, letting them understand that they had no reason to be amased, although their enemies were more in number, for that most of them were peasants, neuer trained vp in armes H nor seene battell; whereof they had had good proofe in many encounters, where they had euer beene victors ouer their enemies, although they were inferiour in number: That they were so many testimonics and assurances that God did fight for them, and would vie them to punish the tyrannies of Stephano, and his cruelties against Moldauia. Finally, if they were victors (whereof he doubted not, if they did their duties) there was not any one but should returne loaden with rich spoiles and recompences from Prince Alexander. This did soen. courage the fouldiers, as they protested all with one voice, rather to die than to faile of their duties. Moreouer, the Princes gaue the Collonels and Captaines to understand of the intelligence they had with the Generall of Stephano's Artillery, wherewith they were much

The next day being the eleventh of October, they began to put their Armies in battell. during the which there were divers skirmishes, wherein Alexanders party had still the aduan. tage; so as it seemed they were so many presages of good Fortune which should befall them that day. The Princes army was ordered by Visnouiskie, to whom Prince Alexander had giuen the charge of Generall, as most capable, having fundry times given sufficient proofes of his sufficiency and valour in other battels. This Generall seeing Stephano's horsemen divided into three squadrons, and the Tartarians most advanced, he appointed the Cossackes to encounter with them: the which was judiciously and discreetly done, for they both goe freely to the charge, neither are they couered with any armes, but only with the skinnes of certaine beasts, wherewith they make themselves to seeme as fearefull as they can, observing no order x in their fighting, and vfing cries which are fearefull to fueh as are not accustomed vnto them; and being once broken, they feldome returne againe to their charge. The Polonian Lanciers called in their language Houssarskie, being about one thousand and five hundred men well armed, made the second battalion of Alexanders army, led by Prince Coreskie, and were placed on the right hand against three thousand Tartarian, Valachian, and Moldauian horsemen. The Hungarian foot being about three thousand men were in the middest of Prince Alexanders Army, with the cannon, vpon a little hill of some advantage; and on the left hand was the rest of the Chaualry, who were led by the Princes Alexander and Visnouikie; and the baggage was a little behinde the foot of the campe where they lodged the night be-

Stephane.

The tyrant Stephano having disposed his Army into divers squadrons, began about nine of the clocke in the morning to play with his cannon upon Alexanders Army, who found that the Generall of the Artillery had kept his promife, for most of the bullets flew ouer his men and hurt them not; vpon which confidence hee commanded the Cossackes to charge the Tartarians which were aduanced, whom they soone descated. At the same instant two thousand light horse gaue charge to the Hungarian footmen which guarded Stephanes cannon, and in an instant cut most of them in pieces, and the rest yeelded themselves; so as Alexander became master of his cannon. The tyrant seeing his Infantery in danger to bee defeated, and his cannon lost, caused a battalion of three thousand Valachian and Molde uian horsemen to aduance, who without doubt had recouered the cannon, but the gene- M rous Prince Coreskie with his Polonian Leunciers charged them fo furiously in the flanke, as that they flew almost the one halfe of them vpon the place, and put the rest that remain ned to rout. Presently after this followed another squadron, the which Coreskie perceiuing,

A hewifely retyred towards his campe, feeing his men wearied and tyred with the flaughter of their enemies, and not able to maintaine the fight without some reft. Then came Prince Alexander, and Visnouskie who was his faithfull guide, with the rest of his horsemen to encounter this last battalion of the enemy, whereunto they went with greater courage, for that they were affured the Vayuod Stephano was there prefent; which charge continued for stephano's and the space of a quarter of an houre, during which time Prince Coreskie had leisure to take my defeated. breath, and to gather together what possibly hee could of those of his party, to succour them that were then in fight, who were almost tyred, and Prince Alexander farre ingaged. But seeing these vnexpected succours, hee and his men recoursed their forces, and their enemies were fo much amased at it, as that all them that remained alive were put to rout and

But Seephano (being naturally a coward) apprehending blowes, had retired himselfe to the rest of his footmen, who had not yet come to fight, making a shew that hee would rather die with them than fly away; but seeing the euent of this last charge, and his horsemen all in rout: he soone resolued to saue himselfe by slight, having neuer given one stroke in this battel. The footmen which remained being about foure thousand men, seeing the successe of the battell, veelded to the mercy of the victors, and cryed out, God faue Alexander Vayuod of Moldauia. The day of the victory Prince Alexander made his entry into the City of Yas, having the Princes Coreskie and Visnouiskie on either fide, after whom followed his whole army. They had also charge to giue the Sultan to vnderstand, That when his Majesty advanced Stephane to be Vayuod of Moldania, he had fallely suggested that hee was sonne to a Prince of Moldauia: that hee was not truely aducrtifed by his Baffacs and Counfellours, that his predeceffour had promifed to the deceased father of Prince Alexander, and to Prince Semeon his which then troubled all Thrace. Comming to Buda they went to falute the Baffa which G commanded there, who being a speciall friend to Stephane, put them in prison, violating the Law of Nations observed by the most barbarous; and afterwards he sent them to Braillewhi. ther the tyrant Stephano had fled. They say he gaue fifteene thousand Chequines in recompence to the Bassa, and to reuenge himselse in some fort of Prince Alexander in the persons of his Embassadours; he caused their heads to be cut off one night after supper, and their bo. dies to becast into the Danowe. The death of these Embassadours was very prejudiciall to Prince Alexander, by meanes whereof the Grand Seigniour was not truly aduertifed of what had past in Moldauia, not received the complements, offers, and submission of Prince Alex. ander, fo as he was wonderfully infenced against him, and sware his ruine, as you shall heare

Stephano having received foure thousand men from Michna Prince of Valachia, and gathe. red together the reliques of his scattered army, he marched towards Valachia, wherof Prince Alexander being aduertised, he sent Prince Coreskie with fix thousand horse, Polonians and Cossackes to Ticouch a strong frontier towne, to guard that passage: And Prince Alexander and Pilnonikie, they staied at Yas with the rest of the army to preserve the country, and to preuent all alterations in fauour of Stephano, who had some intelligencers. Within sew daies as ter, the Prince had newes that the Inhabitants of Horreoua (a Countrey in Moldauia conteining about fifteene or fixteene French leagues in circuit)were in armes, and had joyned with a great troupe of Tartarians to come and inuest him, knowing well that Prince Coreskiewas otherwise emploied with part of the Polonian army. Alexander staied not to have these Re. I bels come to Yas; but fent Visnoniskie his brother in law with fuch forces as he could draw together to encounter with them. They met together within two leagues of the city, where Vilnouiskie charged the Tartarians with fuch fury, as halfe of them were flaine upon the place. and the rest of them sled: there were a great number of prisoners taken, and all the poore inhabitants of Horrcoua were brought vnto Yas in token of triumph. The dead being numbred. there were found about eight hundred Tartarians and others slaine, and of the Polonians only fifty.and some hundred hurt.

Prince Alexander having received newes of this defeat, was wonderfully glad, and went presently to horsebacke with his company of French, which hee had onely reserved about him, to goe and meet with Visnouikie, and to congratulate his happy victory. This being & done with many complements and embracings, he cast his cie voon the poore inhabitants of Horreoua, whom they led like a troupe of Theepe; and had fuch commiseration on them, as he prefently fent them backe againe, having taken their oath of fidelity, hoping that this his clemency would draw the most factious to obedience, having formerly tried the oppresfions of a most cruell Prince. Prince Alexander having given thankes to God for this new and vnexpected victory, he fent a Gentleman vnto Prince Coreskie, to aduertife him thereof, who at the same instant was busic to dispose of his troupes to meet with Stephano, who returned into Moldauia. The encounter was in a plaine Champaine, having on the one fide the river of Sirette, the which divides Moldavia from Valachia: the skirmish continued from tenne of the clocke vntill it was noone with like advantage; but Prince Coreskie L being aduertifed that Stephano was in a squadron of horse which was some two hundred paces distant from him; he joyned vnto his troupe foure hundred Gerbeyes, who were well armed, and led by a very valiant Captaine, with the which he charged him with fuch violence and fury as hee forced them to give backe, yet fighting in such fort as the event seemed to be doubtfull: the which being discouered by another of the Princes Captaines, who led a troupe of four chundred light horse : hee came so fitly to succour him, as Stephane and his horsemen were forced to fly, whom the Prince pursued and cut in peeces. Stephano escaped with a troupe which he had referued rather for the guard of his person, than to fight. Prince Coreskie at his returne from the chase of his enemies, caused the dead to be numbred, where he found that of Stephane's side were three thousand and soure hundred men slaine vpon the M place, besides those that were prisoners and wounded; and of his part only three hundred and

The Embassadour having ended his speech, he delivered his Princes letters G. of credit: To whom Bethlem Gabor made this answer, That hee neuer had an intene to take armes, nor to attempt any thing against Prince Alexander, whose father was his true friend. neither would be euer give any cause to discontinue this loud and friendship betwirt them, wherefore he would give good proofe in all occasions, especially in this subject now in quel ftion. The Embassadour was much satisfied with this answer, the which was also confirmed by letters; yet he afterwards leuied forces against prince Alexander, but he would not joyne

To returne to the course of our History; presently after the Bassa his departure from Cicouch to returne to Constantinople, prince Michna sent an Embassadour to Alexander with Letters, by the which he excused himselfe for the ill vsage of his Embassadour by the Bassa, H protesting that he was much grieued, and that it was not with his consent that he had earlied him with him, promifing to employ his best meanes to mediate his deliuery. Moreouer. that hee was not ignorant what authority and power the Grand Seigniour had outer him whom he might not relift, nor by confequence his Baffaes; that he had no army on foot, as he was given to vinderstand, and that his designe was not to support the cause of the Vayund Stephano, vnlesse he were forced by the commandement of the Grand Seigniour. And whereas he entreated him to deliuer his enemy Stephano into his hands, hee could not do it, whether hee should violate the lawes of hospitality, in betraying his friend who had fled vito him for fuccour, and withall hee should incurre the indignation of the Sultan, and be in dapper to be dispossessed of his owne estate, having no sufficient meanes to maintaine himselfer 1 gainst so great a power. Prince Alexander having heard this Embassadour, and received an answer from the prince of Transyluania, by the aduice of his Councell dismissed all his foot men, and part of the Cossackes, retaining only five or six thousand men with him during the Winter.

Prince Vefno.

About this time there was one of the most cursed and impious acts committed that ever nutic porfored was heard of. Prince Visnoniskie who was a Protestant of the Greeke Church, having orepared at Christmas to receive the communion after their manner, the Priest (who had vity, ally served him in that devotion, being corrupted with money by his enemies) poyloned the bread; which the prince having received, he fuddenly fell ficke, and his torments were forio. lent, as he died the next day. This bred a suspicion that he had beene poysoned; whereupon K the priest was apprehended, who presently confessed that he was guilty, and had beene his uoked by his enemies. As his offence was terrible, being committed by a man of that Cost, who had made vie of so reuerend a Sacrament, to poyson a prince beloued of all men for his rare vertues; so his punishment was very seuere and long; being bound in a chaire made of copper wire, and a fire made round about him, so as he was heard for twelve house crying out fearefully for the insupportable paines which he endured. Whilest that prince aliend der and his whole Court mourned for this fatall and vnexpected accident; there arrived a fpy which hee had fent into Valachia to observe the actions of prince Miching, who gave him stinder Baffa to understand that there was a Baffa arrived called Skinder, with a great and powerfull Afmy, comer with an and that Stephane was there in like manner, who pressed them dayly to march into Molda. I uia; and to begin the warre, hee sent source hundred men to surprise the Towne of Bellating whereas prince Coreskie had left part of his men in garrison during the Winter: who keeping bad guard, were surprised and most of them out in pieces, which so puffed up thephan with pride, as he assured himselfe of an easie victory. But Prince Alexander hearing of this descat, hee sent soure hundred Cossackes, who made such speed, as within three dales after they arrived at Berlada a towne not walled, no more than the rest, where having set sire in many places, they forced his men to come forth, cutting them in peeces, and the reft were buint; so as there escaped not aboue five or fix to carry this bad newes vnto their master, who was much affli Red.

At the fame instant, when as the Cossackes were sent your this expedition, prince estable M desiring to be reuenged for the defeat of his men, tooke two thousand fine hundred thoice horse, and put himselfe speedily into Vasselloy, searing the garrison he had left there would

A be in like manner furprifed: whereof the Buffa being advertised, by fome of the countrymen, he fent his fonne (being twelve or thirteene yeares old) and gave him an old Turke of great experience for his conductor, with feuen thousand men holding this a good occasion to get reputation to his sonne. Prince Crreskie being aductifed of his march by some Moldauians, and that they should surprise them early in the morning, knowing that they were of necessity to paste a bridge of wood ouer a river that runs by the towns, he disposed his men in such fort as that the enemy/could hardly discouer them : some of them were lodged within Vasfelloy, and the reft were couered with a little mountaine that adjoyned upon the towne : when as fome of the Tinks had passed the bridge, two squadrons sallied from the towne, and charged their foreward fo furionfly, as they were in a manner all put to the fword, and among ft B them the conductor of the whole troupe, the which was no difficult thing to execute tor that the Furks who had marched in a maner all night, to arrive early in the morning, were benummed and halfe dead with cold; the rest of the Turks which had not yet past, hearing the noyfe of this hot alarme, durit mot advance, but retyred speedily, fearing perchance that the Baffaes sonne might be lossaqwell as his conductor. Prince Coreskie pursued them unto a village foure leagues distant from Vasselloy, killing and taking prisoners all he found in the way. Among the prisoners there was one who gaue it out that he was neere kinseman vnto the Baffa, who being broughtto prince Alexander, he received him very courteoufly, and gave him a garment fit for him, having beene ftript of his owne, he also gaue him a horse, and fent him backevnto the Baffa with a good conucy, to whom he fent a letter, by the which he inc treated him norto aduancounfauour of Stephano, promising that if the Grand Seignior would suffer him to enjoy Moldauia quietly, hee would be most faithfull vnto him afterwards, and pay him the yearely accustomed tribute; whereof the Bassa made no great account; for hee was wonderfully intenced, both for his font bad fuccesse in this enterprise, and for the death of the Turkish captaines to the year and

Thefo eight hundred men neglecking their guards, did nothing but drinke drunke, and molest their hosses with all kinde of infolonoics, and forcing their wives and daughters, D which made them take a resolution to be rounged, and to that end they called vnto them certaine Boyersout of the dountry, who chusing their time, cut all their throats when they were allesp and most of them thunke: I will are

1616 Zefuirs at Conftantinople

At Constantinople about the end of August this yeare 2626, Enuic, the most furious of all the windes that shake the affaires of the World, stirred up a horrible tempes, whose violent gusts fell dangerously voon the lesuites fettled at Pera by the Sultans permission at the perfusion of Henry the fourth, the French King; and labours to east them vpon the rocks where they might fuffer shipwrecke, shamefull to their Order, and prejudiciall to the Chris stians which live in the middest of Mahometisme. And to ruine them without all boxe of helpe or reliefe, they accused them before the Grand Visier, to be spies to Spaine to give absolution to renegadoes; to baptise Turks, to conceale sugitive flaues, and to fend them into Christendome ; and withall they objected the doctrine of killing of Kings, if they were tyrants, the which had beene rashly written by a Spaniard of their Coattall which crimes are commonly punished at Constantinople with death. They seifed upon their persons and lodged them in a dungeon, they were fix in number, that is to fay, Francis Bonton, Denis Guiller. Dominick Manrice of Chio, and John Baptiffa lebert their superiour, all source Priests, and two affiltants, and with them a Franciscan Friar, Vicar to the Patriarch of Constantinonic. A suspition of danger in an estate is easily believed upon the least accident. In the meane time the Emperours Embassadour came to Constantinople, to renew the truce, they entered with their drummes beating, and their entignes displaied. They which thought to ered trophics to their glory by their ruine of the lefuites, made we of this entry, and gave falle admertile. " ments to the Seraglio, that there were in Confiantinople, and at Pera many thousands of Christians difficient in the habites of Greekes and Turks, which came with this Embasse. dour, with an intent to put that in execution which she Icluites had projected. Moreour, they enformed the Grand Visier, and the Muphti, that the Churches in Pera, and the Embaffadours houses were full of armose and that slow when as the Turks estate and especially Conflantinople, was unprovided of forces, having employed their armies in divers places, and at one instant, as in Poland, Persia, and both the seas, that they meant to draw the Greeket into rebellion, and give an entry to the Coffackes, by the blacke Sea. The Sultanandhis Baffaes tooke an alarme, they commanded enery man to weare the habit of his owne Nation, with a prohibition to weare any hat except the Frankes, and they to weare a Grecian libit; I They also involled all the Christians in Constantinople and Pera. Burthe Sultandidant thinke his Imperial City of Conftantinople free from the danger of furprise by this different fearch, but he would feeke his affurance in the bloud of the Christians, to as he commanded that all the Frankes should be slaine without exception. But yet this commandement took no effect, by reason of the remonstrances which the grand Visier and the Musti made him, representing unto bim, That by this cruelty he should draw upon his estate a dangerous Warre from allthe Christian princes in generall. But allthis freed him not from fear the malks all night vp and down the City, contrary to his vivall custome, and he caused a Frier, Vicar to the Patriarch, who had beene taken with the Iesuits, to be executed in his presence; and hee doth expressely forbid the passage from Constantinople to Pera, and from Pera to Constant M flantinople.

During this prohibition, the French Emballador had past from Persted the city, to folicit the lesuits libertie. At his return he had found the passage stopt, he goes vnto the Musiciand A leaves his people in the meane time at the fea fide (for it is the custome, to goe to the Sourreigne of Mahomets law with a small traine) during the time of his being there, a multitude of people ran downe to the shore, to see these men, thinking for certaine, that they went to put them to death: They lamenting their miserable fortune, and the Turks charging them furioufly with injuries, as the men whom they thought practifed by conspiracy their ruine. But the grand Visier having written with his owne hand, and sent one of his people to them that kept the passage, the Embassadour with his whole traine was suffered to passe to Pera, but he found the storme as raging at Pera as from whence he came: for one night after, the people A thingle at of that place fell into such a fury, as it was to be feared the law of Nations would have beene Pera. violated by the infolency of some furious people, although the subject were of small impor-

B tance. About fiue hundred paces from the French Embassadours quarter, there fell out a difoute in a lodging, betwixt some who spent the night in some kinde of emploiment : the Turks that dwelt neere, being awaked with this noise, ran to armes, and trouped together in the street, beeing in all a thousand men armed, crying out, that this noise came from the Franckes, (that is to say from the Christians in the West, as Italians, French, Spanish, English, and others) who meant to rise; and they resolved to force the Embassadours houses, and to put all to fire and sword, if some better aduised of the troupe had not persuaded them to delay the execution untill day, the which being come, the French Embassadour had meanes to get the Sultan to interpose his souereigne authority, to bridle the insolency of a multitude inconsiderately insenced. Such is the danger in the which many times the ministers of Christian Princes find themselues, who for their Masters service live at the mercy of a Nation barbarously furious, as the Turkish. The Is suites in the meane time continued prisoners in the dungeon, untill that the Baron The testility set of Sanfy Embassadour for France, had let the Grand Visier see their innocency, and procured as sheets. their liberty, and the Sultan by his letters Patents did publish the falsehood of the malicious accusations invented against them : but to avoid the sury of a multitude blind in their passons, and dangerous in their fury, they went to fea to returne to France: but after they had fojourned sometime at the Dardanels, they were againe committed to prison, by reason of some certaine aduertisement that was given to the Sultan of the same substance: the Sultan informed himselse truely of their probity, gaue them their liberty, calling backe to Pera, to D live there, with the same priviledges they formerly had, and suffered the rest to returne into Alexander Prince of Moldauia having lost a thousand horse neere vnto Cochina, the last yere as you have heard, the Baffa and Stephano were puft vp with this good successe; but Michna had no joy of it, who hearing that the Princes attended him at Chochina with a refolution to defend themselves, remembring that a certaine Italian making a profession to foretell suture things, had told him, That if he cuer came to fight with the Polonians, he would be in danger of his life. Wherefore by the aduice of his Chancellor and Campe mafter, called Spaterlecha, he pretended that he had received news from his Lieutenant, that there was a great troupe of Tartarians entered into Valachia, and spoiled the country, vponwhich pretext he tooke leave of the Baffa and returned, leaving all his fouldiers in the army, referving only an hundred horse for his guard. Being in Valachia, Stephane wrote vnto him, that he had deseated the Polonians in battell, in the which there were flaine fix thousand men upon the place, and had taken a great number of prisoners, which they meant to send to the grand Seignior: all which was but a meere invention to mocke Michna, and to make him forry that he was not in the action : whereupon he was fo much discontented, as he caused the heads of his Chancellour and Camp master to be cut off for their bad counsell, charging them that they had some secret intelligence with the Polonians.

About the end of March, the Bassa with Stephano, and a Tartarian Prince called Monoza, to- The Bassa and folued to aduance with their whole army (being twenty thousand men) towards Chochina, Suppano defeaand being within two leagues, they made a stand a whole day to refresh their men. In the ted at Guibina, meane time the Princes put their army in order of battell, in a little plaine within a quarter of aleague of Chochina, leaving a thousand choice horse within the towne vader the command of Prince Coreskie, affuring themselves that the Turks would not faile to campe betwirt the G towne and the Princes army, that if they were defeated they might have no meanes to retire into the fort, which was held impregnable. The Princes drew eight pieces of cannon out of the fort, which they planted within a trench which was couered with a wood. The Baffa on the other fide thought that he had the Princes at his mercy, being advertised that they had not halfe fo many men in their Army, early in the morning hee caused his men to match in good order, who arrived neere to Cochina by feuen of the clocke in the morning, where he uing made a stand to discouer the Princes army, he went and encamped betwirt them and the zowne as it had beene foreseene. His men being put in order, the Tartarians who had agreat defire to be reuenged of the Cossackes, who had defeated them in many encounters, intreated to have the point: the which was granted, and the trumpets founding, they advanced towards H a battalion of Cossackes, nothing distrusting the cannon which was planted on that side, and not scene. Comming within the shot, they presently plaied upon them, and ouerthrew a great number of the Tartarians, and terrified the rest, the which the Ccossakes perceiving, they charged them furiously, and cut the rest in peeces, and so returned towards their army, seeing another squadron of Valachians and Moldanians come to succour the Tartarians. The Lord of Tischenich with his troup of fifteene or fixteene hundred horse well armed, went to encoun. ter the faid squadron, which advanced bravely towards the Princes cannon. The combate was long without any thew of advantage, which made the Marthall of the Turks Army to fend three thousand Turks to succour them : and the Princes caused a squadron of Cossakes and Moldauians to advance, who carried themselves so valiantly, as they forced the Turks to 1 retire aboue an hundred paces. Then Prince Alexander cryed out, Now my companions, brhold the enemy is in disorder, let vs charge them resolutely, and the victory is certaine. After which he advanced with the rest of his Army, commanding two cannons should be shot off together, for a figne to Prince Coreskie that he might fally forth, and charge the Turks rereward, as it had bin resolued: But he staied not for the fignall, being already advanced about three hundred paces, fearing that the party would be ended without him, or that he should

The Bassa seeing this stratagem, which he feared not, and the bad successe of his menwhich he had fent to fight, and that he was charged both before and behinde, he began to be smaled. and having caused a squadron of two thousand horse, Turks and Valachians, to advance, to g fecond his troupes, he retyred apart with Stephano (who was no leffe afraid than himfelfe) with the rest of the Turkish Cauallary, to attend the euent of the battell. There was neuer a more furious combat seene (which continued for the space of two houres) full of searefull howlings of Turks, who in the end fainted, seeing no succours come vnto them: whereas if the Bassa and the cowardly Stephano had joined with them, they had without doubt fortified their carriages and renued their forces, and by all apparance woon the victory, which they lost beyond all mens expectation. When as the Bassa and Stephano saw that their forces were in rout, and no meanes to draw them againe together, they began to make a retreat with about two thousand horse, which had not yet fought. In the meane time the Princes Tischenichand Coreskie (like two thunderbolts of warre) curall in peeces they could meet; and fearing left li they should make a new head, the Princes drew all their men together, and made a stand upon the place of battell, not suffering their souldiers to go to the spoile, before they were assured that the enemy was retired in great haste, fearing the Princes would have pursued them, the which they would willingly have done, if their men and horses had not been almost tyred in the former battell, in which there were slain aboue twelue thou sand men besides the wounded and prisoners.

gaue thankes to God for the victory they had obtained against the Turks and their confede-Prince cereity rates; and there was much joy with the Princes and all the Ladies, who were retired into the his Mistresse, whom he loued as his owne life; so as by a free consent of all parties, they were married within two daies after the victory, to the great content of all the Court.

Prince Alexander being returned to Cochina with the other Princes and Noblemen, they fort, attending the euent of this fearefull battell. Prince Goreskie burned with defire to enjoy M

Whilest that the Princes began to enjoy the fruits of their victory, the Bassa and wretched Scephano returned to Yas, but finding no fafety there, they parted prefently; the Baffa to Constantinople, and the tyrant into Valachia to Prince Michna, who was his onely support, notwithstanding that he had mocked him apparantly. But before this wretch departed from Yas (having no hope ever to returne againe) he caused the towne to be set on fire in many places; fo as of two and twenty thousand houses, there were not aboue fix hundred vntouched. The Princes having advice hereof in the beginning of Aprill, they marched speedily thither, where finding it so desolate, they resolued to pursue Stephano into Valachia, and punish him according to his deferning. The next day they marched towards Valachia, being to passe the river of Siretta, there being on the other side a Borough in which Michina had B foure hundred men in garrison, to keepe the Frontiers. The Princes arriving at this place, the garrison put themselnes in desence, but they were soone forced and cut in pieces, so as there escaped not one, and as for the inhabitants, they were well entreated, having made no resistance, and withall they hated Michna for the vexations they received from the said garrifon. The Army having rested there three dayes, advanced with all speed towards the City of Bonza, whereas Michna then remained with wretched Stephano, who had no care but to make good cheere. The Army beeing come within a league of Bonza, it was discoursed by some countreymen who ran to aduertise their Prince, withing him to sauchimselse specdily, for that they had discouered the Polonian Army necre the City. Michna was ready to fit downe to dinner, having invited Stephano to accompany him : but he was fo amafed at this Vince Michael

The Princes being entered Bonza without refishance, they were wonderfully gricued that they had not found seephano, which was their whole designe, and that Prince Michna (towhom they intended no harme) had beene so amazed. The Army at the first enterance spoyled the city, which the Princes could not hinder, nor yet the rauishing of many wines and virgines, which drew the wrath of God vpon them, and in all appearance was the true cause of the D miseries which afterward besell the Princes. During their abode at Bonza to refresh their men, many Boyers or Noblemen of the Countrey (defiring to shake off the yoke of Prince Michna's command, who gouerned infolently) came vnto Prince Alexander, beseeching him to stay in Valachia, promising that the whole Nobility would willingly yeeld him all obedience and fidelity. But the Prince (hauing no intent to dispossessed Michna) thanked them for Prince Alextheir good will, the which the Boyers understanding, they told him, that they would bee ander ut after their good will, the which the Boyers understanding, they told him, that they would be ander ut after the faur of glad (feeing he refused it) that Prince Cherbanne (who had beene their Vayuod before Michna, Valachia. and had beene expelled Valachia by Bethlem Gabor, and forced to retire into Germany to the Emperour) might returne and take vpon him the gouernment of Valachia, entreating him to give him paffage through Moldauia if he presented himselse, the which Prince Alexander willingly granted, defiring much that Prince Cherbanne were restored, for that Michna fauoured his enemy, and had himselse a designe vpon the estate of Moldauia, which in the end he

Prince Michna being come to Playa, which is betwixt Bonza and Tergonist, he stayed fome dayes there attending his traine, during the which he sent speedily to his wife being at Tergottiff, willing her to goe with all speed to Nicopolis: for that he seared the Princes would feise both voon them and their estates, as they might casily haue done, if they had forescene what afterwards besell them. Michna being come to Tergouist, he presently sent an Embassadour to Prince Alexander, to know vpon what designe hee had entered Valachia with an Army, having no cause; but contrariwise, that he had given good testimony that F he was his friend, for that hee would not affift the Baffa and Stephano, when they purfued him to Cochina, notwithstanding that they were much stronger in shew; That if his intent were onely to seise vpon Stephane, hee assured him that hee was not with him, but was fled another way; promiting that if he could ever take him, he would deliver him into his hands:

intreating him withall to retire out of his estate, not suffering his army to spoyle it any more, G and that they might continue good friends. Prince Alexander received this Embaffadour very courteoufly, who hearing the subject of his Embassie, made answere, That hee had the day before fent vnto his Master to informe him of his intent, which was not to attempt any thing against his person nor estate, but onely to pursue Stephane who had set fire on the City of Yas before he parted: and to let Michaa know, That he meant not towing him, nor to enrich himselse with any thing that was his, he had sent him backe his plate, with all his rich mooueables. Michna's Embassadour having thanked Prince Alexander, returned to Tergouista, and found all true that the Prince had faid; the which freed Michna from further feare.

1500 Targaria Trojanosk e.

Before Prince Alexanders departure from Bonza, he sent the Lord Troianoskie with two H and defeated by thousand horse to pursue Stephano : but it was without effect, for he understood that he had passed the river of Danow with his wife, and a small traine. At the same time a troupe of fifteene hundred Tartarians, being aduertised that the Polonians pursued Stephano onely with a thousand horse, and that they were tyred with their long marches, advanced to charge them; but it was not with that successe they expected: for Trojanoskie discoucring them a farre off in a plaine champion field, had leafure to put his men into foure squadrons, and there attended them, who approching neere to discouer the number of the Polonians. would gladly return without blowes, but it was too late: for Troianoskie commanded two of his squadrons to charge them suddenly, so as within lesse than a quarter of an houre they were deseated, and aboue foure hundred flaine vpon the place, the rest fled the same way that they came of the Polonians there were not about five and twenty flaine, and about fifty

The Princes had resolved to leave Valachia, forbidding all Captaines and souldiers upon paine of death to carry away any Valachian of either fex with them, hearing they had seised voon some, and meant to draw a ransome from them: after which they began to march, and being upon the way, they were aduertifed that the inhabitants of Horreous were againe reuolted and in armes, refufing to acknowledge Prince Alexander, or to pay the accustomed tibute vuleffe he would make it appeare that he was confirmed by the Grand Seignior. Prince Coreskie was fent thither with flue thousand men, whose comming did so amaze them, as they yeelded without any refistance. This Prince being loath to lose any time, laid! fiege to the g towne and fort of Bialigront, feated upon the river of Bohou, the which was held by the Tartanians Præcopences, in which fort there was a garrifon of Ianizaries, and many Boyers of Moldauia, who defended themselves valiantly, and made many sallies, in which they slew a. boue three hundred of the Princes men, and he himselse was in danger to be taken, if he had not beene speedily deliuered by the Lord of Tischeuich and his troupe, who charged the lanizaries so resolutely, as they forced them to retire, leaving many of their men dead vponthe place. The Prince seeing there was no hope to take the place without cannon, raised his siege and returned to Yas to Prince Alexander.

Soone after, Hebraim Bassa wrote to Prince Alexander (as if he had beene his friend) giving him to understand, That from thenceforth hee should live quietly in Moldavia, for that the L Grand Seigniours Lieutenant Generall or chiefe Visier (from whom Stephano had alwaies drawne his chiefe support) was in disgrace, promising the Prince to employ himselse for him to his Master: the which hedid either to make him carelesse of his owne strength, or to draw some recompence or reward from him, if the Grand Seigniour should confirme him in Moldauia, as there was some likelihood, seeing that Stephane had made himselse altogether vnworthy; as well by his flight, as by his wicked actions, which made him in the end fo odious to the Grand Seigniour, as hee resolued to ruine him. So as soone after they were aductifed, That the Grand Seigniour had given commandement vnto the said Bassa to seize vpon Stephano, who had retired himselse to Brahile, and to bring him vnto him aliue or dead, with what societ did belong vnto him : the which he executed after this manner: the M faid Baffa marched with all diligence towards Brahile, carrying a Chiaux with him, and being within foure or fine leagues of the towne, he fent one of his people to advertile stephan of his comming, and that he meant the next day to dine with him. Stephano (who diffushed nothing) holding the Visier to be still his friend, parted early in the morning to meet him, and comming neer him he alighted from his horse to do him reverence, and the Bassa did the likes where after some little conserence together, he drew out the commission he had to seise vpon his person, and to cary him to Constantinople. The which Stephano perceiving he turned him to his feruants, and willed them to shift for themselves, for that hee saw hee went to his death. His men being retired, the Chiaus who had his mace in his hand gaue him a blow betweene the shoulders, and then caused him to be bound hand and foot, and cast into a cast drawne by four good horses, and in this maner they caried him to Constantinople: where being arrived. to avoid the punishment he had deserved, he denied his faith and became a renegado, & withall he became very poor and miserable; for at the same instant when he was taken, the Bassa R fent to feife and carry away what soeuer he had at Brahile & Nicopolis, where his wife remained, so as he had nothing left him but remorfe of conscience, which tormented him continually, for the barbarous cruelties he had practifed in Moldauia. Some of his men returned ro Yas, and there declared what had befallen Stephano in their prefence, for which they generally gaue thanks vnto God, and were very joyfull.

Soon after, newes came to Yas, That the Sultan had appointed prince Michna to succeed Stephano in the principalitie of Moldauia (which is far better than that of Valachia) and that he sent Skinder Bassa his General in Europ, with a powerfull army to settle the said Atichna. and to expel Alexander. The which proued so true as on the 25 of Iune this yeare 1616, the faid Bassa came to Tergouist, where prince Michna attended him, with great preparatives both to receive him and to refresh his army. The Bassa entring into Tergouist, had among st other things of note, thirty or forty mulitians on horleback, playing vpon certain inflruments almost like to gitterns, which made but filly musick, he had also many pages, who in stead of cloaks ware the skins of leopards, lions, and tygers, as if they meant to terrifie the world, and his army confifted of about 20000 men, some Turks, some Tartars; to whom Michna joyned his forces, having 10000 horse and foot which he had drawn from Valachia and the neighbor countries. The Baffa being entred the castle wheras I rince Michna attended him, after many complements they entred into a great hall wel appointed, where the Baffa prefented him with his letters patents, and a robe which his mafter had fent to Michna, which hee cauted to be put on in the presence of all the noblemen of his court, proclaiming him prince of Molda. D ma, with many ceremonies too long to relate. After which, prince Michna led the Baffa into Aichna proanother great hall, where a feast was prepared, both for himselfe and such as hee would admit of stoldaria. to his table: Michne offering to ferue the Baffa, but he would not fuffer him, causing him to fit down right against him. On the second of July they departed from Tergouist, and marched into Moldauia: wherof the Polonian princes were aduertifed but the princesse mother to Alexander maintained, that the Bassa came only to bring the patents to her son. Which dangerous opinion of hers grew by reason of the letters which Hebraim Baffa had fent to prince lexander not remembring that it came from a Turk his sworn enemy, and therefore not to bee credited, especially in a matter of that importance, so as she was the cause of their vtter ruine.

About this time the General of the king of Polonia's Army, called Zolkelchy, enuying the E honor which the Polonian princes had gotten by fo many victories, and withall drawn by his own privat interest, writ to prince Michna and the Bassa, That if they would promise to procure the Sultan to advance the eldest son of the deceased prince Simeon (who lived with him) to be Prince of Valachia (whereof his father had bin formerly Vayuod) he would fo weaken the Princes army, as they should be sorced to yeeld or flie. Whose demand being easily granted, this traitor writ to certaine Captaines of the Coslacks, that they should leave the Princes army, and come with all foced into Poland, to accompanie Vladiflam their Kings fon, who had been chosen Duke of Muscouie, and meant to go thither with a great army by reason of fome croffes; and that they should be very well paid. The Cossackes (who depend you the Crowne of Poland, serving those that promise) most began to mutiny, saying plainly, That if the costates F they had not money speedily, they would retire into their countrey, yet concealing that they marries and had bin called to any other feruice; and without any long flay, there parted early in a morning Alexander. about 8000 carrying with them great flore of oxen, sheepe, and other cattell, with all the spoyles they had gotten in the precedent victories.

or for that he had an apprehension of this powerfull army that came against them, retired al. G fo feeretly toward Michna and the Baffa, being followed by 2000 horfe. This much amaged the princes army, & yet as if they had bin inchanted by fome divellish charms, they could not resolue to make a retreit while they might haue don it without danger. Many adulted prince Alexander to this course, yea prince Michna by letters persuaded him to return into Polonia, before his army came neerer to Yas. Which he did for fear of the successe, wheref his falle prophet had forewarned him, as is formerly noted. Wherupon Alexander went to councel the 25 of luly, but they could not resolue; the commaunders and souldiers being much divided, most of them demanding their pay, else they would not fight; the which they took for a pretence of their retreit. In the mean time the Tartars, who made the vantgard of prince Mich. na's army, approched; which made the princes to leaue Yas, & to march toward Cochina:but H they could not do it fo secretly but the Tartars heard of it, who past speedily thorow the city and charged them in the rearc. In which incounter George Potoskie, Nephew to him that was taken with Conftantine, having fought valiantly, & flain many Tartars with his own hand, was in the end shot thorow the body with an arrow, wherof he died presently. The lord Tischenich came speedily to the charge with a troupe of Cossacks which he had staied, and charged the Tartars fo furioufly, as he flew 800 vpon the place and put the rest to rout.

Alexander having received the forementioned letter from prince Michna, made answer, that contrary to his promise to continue his friend, & neuer to take arms against him, he had craued aid of the Turk to dispossesse him of Moldania, to which his predecessor had never pretended, neither could they according to the fundamentall lawes of the country, and the conuentions accorded by the grand Seignior when as the Moldanians submitted themselues vader his foueraignty, by the which no man could be Vayuod of Moldauia vnlesse he were bom in the country. Moreoner, he should remember that it was in his power to dispossess being Valachia, when as he entred Bonza with his army in purfuit of Stephane: the which he would not do, nor detain any of his pretious moueables, but had fent them all vnto him. That if hee abused the power which he then had, God would not suffer so great an ingratitude and vsimps tion to passe vnpunished. And although his army were far inferior to his, yet he should know hee neither feared him nor the Baffa, putting his chiefe confidence in the Almighties affistance, who had in many occasions vied them to abate the Turkes pride, which hee should abhor if he were a true Christian, rather than to join with them to satisfie his ambition.

Prince Michna having fent this letter to Skinder Bassa Generall of the Turks army, he was so insenced, as hee presently commaunded his Lieutenaut to pursue the Polonians with 12000 choice men, they being then at Cotnard betwixt Yas and Cochina. Prince Alexander beeing aduertised hereof, he suddenly caused his army to aduance towards the fort of Cochina. At the same time Prince Cherbannes Chancellour, who came with a hundred and fifty horse vnto prince Alexander, to aduertife him that his master was comming to his aid with five or five thousand men, was pursued by the Turks neer unto Yas, wheras he thought to have found the faid prince; and of all his troupe only himself and one more escaped, so as the prince could haue no certain news of the faid Cherbanne. Prince Coresky, who had staied with 2500 boile not far from Cotnard, was also incountred with a great troup of Turks and Tartars, which he L could not wel discouer by reason of a little mountain that concred them. The prince seeing fome of them appear, charged them; but finding that as he defeated one troup, a fresh succesded in his place, he was forced to retire, with this advantage, that he had flain almost 6000 of his enemies, having not lost about 250 of his owne men. But the prince was wounded with two arrows, one in the thigh, and the other in the backe, which was a great disaster for himself and for the whole army. He which commanded this troup of Turkes being very muchamafed at this vnexpected incounter, having gathered his men together, and joined them so fit teen thousand others whom the Bassa had sent, he being yet at Yas, he caused this army to approch within a quarter of a league of the Polonians; where basing incouraged his men in what he could, he told them, That to shew his affection vnto the Sultans service in this occs. M fion, he was refolued to fend a challenge to prince Coresky, whom hee confessed to be the most Printe coresty valiant man of all the Polonian army. So as he presently dispatched one of his Captaines to etallinged by governothe prince, and to call him in the behalfe of his Generall. The Captaine comming the Tarke Ge. to Alexanders camp, demanded to speak with prince Coresky, who being brought vnto him, denied.

A livered the charge he had from the Generall. The prince, although he were neither able to . fland, nor to fit on horsebacke, by reason of his wounds, yet would need s have accepted this challenge, if prime Alexander and the chiefe noblemen of the army had not confused him to excuse himselfe by reason of his indisposition; letting him know; that the event of such a combine did noronly import him, but all those of his party, who had their chief hope in him. Wherento the princeffes added their infrant intreaties, and among others his deare Spoule. who was much afflicted for his wounds. The Lord Tifthenich a braue and valiant Gentleman being then prefent, earneftly intreated prince Alexander to give him leave to accept of the challenge for prince Coresky his coufin: the which being easily granted, he fent a Gentleman with the faid Turk to know if the General would yeeld thereunto. Which he did willingly. R not being ignorant of the qualitie and valour of the faid Tifeheuich. It was agreed, That the combat should be betwixe both armies, lying in an open field, within a quarter of a league of one another, with promife that neither party should be affisted.

These two brane warriors having taken leave of their friends came to the place appointed in view of both armies. The Turks General being about fifty paces from his army, caused water to be brought, with which he washed his mouth, eies, nofe, ears, and priny parts, beleeuing (according to his Law) that this washing would serue as a purifying then turning toward the East he made his prayer, after which he went to horseback, being righly armed and furnished. and then marched foftly toward his adverfarie, who attended him well mounted and armed. and so began the combat; their chief arms being bows and arrows which they spent without C hurring one another; til at last Tischeuich having a petronel, thou the Turke thorow the body and overthrew him, who firiting to rife again, Tifeheusch passed over him with his horse, and wounded him in his right arm, and at the next blow flew him: after which he cut off his head and caried it to prince Alexander.

The Polonians were very joyfull of the happy successe of this famous combat, and the Turks being much amased, advertised the Bassa and Michna. That they should bring the rest of the army and their cannon, if they would be reuenged of the Polonians. In the mean time the traitor Biche, who had abandoned prince Alexander, with a troup of two thousand Tartaria ans and Moldauians found means to get before the Polonian army, and to cut off the way betwixt Cotnarde and the town of Bothocan fix leagues off. The Valachians and Transvlva-D nians led by the General of Michna's army inuefted them upon the right hand, and the body of the Turks army followed behind: fo as there remained nothing but you the left hand a wood of timber trees, which might favor their retreit.

Skinder Baffa hearing the fuceeffe of the combat, commanded his army to advance prefent- The prince of ly with fixteen canons. The Princes feeing themselves invironed by so many enemies, they Polonia inviresolued to fortifie themselves with their carts and carriages, and to defend themselves. But entitle what could five or fix thousand men prouatil against two or three and twenty thousand; for so many were thought to be in the Turks attmy. Frue it is, they expected daily prince Cherbanne & the lord Boss, who were within two dais journy, and brought with them ten or 12000 men. This made the Baffa and Michia to advance, to force the Poloniaus to yeeld or to fight, Com. E ming neer virto their camp, and feeing them felues muefted on all fixes but toward the wood they approched their cannon, which had been able to have spoyled their Campe, but that it was not their defigne; for they only defired to take the princes and prince fles prifoners, with the chiefe Noblemen and Captaines of the Army. Whereupon they feat to furnmen the Polonian fouldiers to deliver into their hands the faid princes and Lords, promising that the reft of the Army should depart with bag and baggage. Whereumto they would not yould but made an answer with one confent, That they would rather die than commit. Such baseness and treacherie. This being reported to the Baffa and prince Michna, they commaunded char fome of their canon should be charged with small bullets, and discharged through the Poloman army, whereby a great number were flaine and wounded. The princes who had but fome F smal pieces, made certain vollies, but to small purpose neither had they any more bullets left, and little pouder, for that by il chance part had bin burnt fome few daies before: fo that all things feemed to forestell their ruine at hand. The Lord Tifthewich having diligently obferued, that remaining in that inclofure he could not escape death or at least captivity, resolved with 300 horfe, the most wallant among it the Polonisms to force thorow three or four four drons which were fet in gard by the wood fide to the end none snight efeapeathet place bee. ing most suspected by the Turks. The which they exhoused with such fury asithey ouesthree all they incountred; thewing shat it is a very dangerous thing so make head against these who are reduced to that extreminie as they multeither wanquish or die. Prince Coreiky would not have failed to have made the like retreit, and to have nearled prince Alexander with him tou he could not fit on horseback by reason of his wounds and besides, he had rather have died, than to leave his wife in that extremitie. His last rotage was to disguise himself as well ashe could, giving it out that he was escaped with Tifebeaich, that so he might passe for a common foldier if the prisoners were put to ransom. In like maner the Princesses disguised themselves Same Str.

The Turks cannon having operehrown many of their cariages, which served as a Rampier, two squadrons, one of Tartars, another of Turke, piesented themselves at one instant, in two feueral places to force the Rolonian camp, who feeing no means; to make refistance and to repel their enemies, laid down their arms, and yeolded. Wherat, their enemies were exceeding glad, defiring nothing more than to take these noble princes prisoners, and to dispose of the rest at their pleasure. The Turks and Tattars having entred their camp, making spoil of all, and seising vpon what they could lay hands on, beginning to there their prisoners, the princes lexander and Bong dan, with their mother, were delivered vnto Skinder Baffa, who led them to Constantinople, wheras foon after their arrival they for look their God, denied their faith and became renegado's, for fear of perpetual imprisonment wherewith they were shreatened. For which infidelitie Bongdanwas presently punished, for having caused himself to be circumsi. fed according to the Law of Mahomat, he died, and the Prince fie his mother was confined to the old Seraglio. As for prince Coreskie, in this generall ruin of a Christian army (being for ced to yeeld and fubmit it felfe to the Turks tyrannie) he had so disguised himselfe, that hee past for a time vnknown, and was led to Yas among the common foldiers where he was afterwards discourred by a soldier of his own party, who obtained his libertie by this base treche. rie. The Turkish Captaine who had gotten the Prince, hearing of his qualitie by the aforefaid Villein, he led him vnto Skinder Baffathe Generall, who recompensed him well, and made both him and the fouldier that discovered him, to take solemne oathes not to impart it to any man ; for he had an intent to draw some great ransom from this prince, and to restore him to K his former libertie, knowing wel, that if he carried him to Constantinople the grand Seignior would confine him into his prisons, by which means he should make no vie nor benefit by his taking. But it happed, that another Perfidious of the Polonian army advertised Asicha of Coreskies captiuitie, and in whose hands he was; who was so jealous, as he crost and outsides the good defigne of skinder Balla, telling him plainly in the presence of many, That heekner for certain prince Coruly was among his flaues, and shat he should bewate he did not eleape for that the grand Seignior would call him to account. The General answered, That he would be glad if it were fo, but he had not yet any notice of him, thanking Michae for his good adnice. But fearing that if he did what he intended fuffering prince Coresty to escape for a nafom, the Sultan comming to the knowledge therof would be much infenced, and punish him L with diffrace or deathsthe next day he told prince Michna plainely, that the aduice that her had given him was true, and that Coresky had bin found difguifed among his other prisoners, whom he would present vnto his master, with the princes Alexander and Bong dan; as he did, of whole deliuence you shall heare hereafter. In the Mediterranian fen Cofmo great Duke of Tuscanie continued his enterprises this yeare against the Turks : his gallies part from Ligorne and runne into the Levans, in questo fome occasions to anoy these infidels. They drew necreanto, Cerigo, in old time Cyclest, M the ewency fift of April, where meeting with certaine Christian things, some Venetians aftersifed them, That in the Island of Chiothe Turkes had prepared two gallies to passointo Barbarie. Inghirami Admiral to the great Duke resoluted to set upon them : beeing on the way,

A he turned with his fleet where they were to passe, and being couered by the night, hee cast anchor under castle Roux. But as he attended a fair occasion, the Moone shining discouered him vnto the Turks; and the gards having advertised the Turkes Gallies, they presently began to flie, the one rowing amaine towards land, and the other continuing her course at sea with all speed. Inghirami with his Admirall gally got before that which was going to land, inuested it (being followed by the gally called S. Siephen) and three houres within night grapled with it, and labored to enter it: but the Turks (who were all good fouldiers) defended it valiantly, fo as they were about an hour fastned together, hewing one another furiously: year the Turks entring Inghirami his gally, fought valiantly vpon the hatches, but in the end the Florentines had the victorie, and took this gally, yet with much losse of Christian bloud. It was the Pa-B trongally of that famous pyrat Amurath Raife, which was commanded by the fon of Mammi a Portugall, called Mustapha Celebi, who was taken alive, but fore wounded. The other Galley Turkish gallee which was fled to fea, and was the Captaine galley of the faid Amurath Raife, commanded by taken by the the Bey of Mitylene, nephew and fon in law to the faid pirat, called Amurath, who had married his daughter, being his mothers fon, was inuefted by the gallies of S. Mary Magdalen, and the Patron S. Cosmo. This combat was no lesse surious than the other, the Turkes making a wonderful defence: but in the end, the bloud on either fide being abundantly fpilt, the Florentines had the victoric. Amurath Bey of Mitylene was flain, and Mustapha, whom these Turkish gallies carried to Algier in Barbary. They were of twenty fine bankes a piece, earrying lanthorns, and furnished with all things necessary, manned with 420 Ianizaries, all men of a-C Aion, and practifed in piracies with that pirat Amurath Rais. In this prize the Florentines took 240 Turks; and freed 430 Christians: among the artillery of these gallies they recouered a cannon and two facres of the gally of S. Iohn, and a fail belonging to the great dukes captain gally, which the pirat Amurath Rais had formerly spoiled. These Turkish gallies were loden with great store of rich commodities, the which were valued at 200000 crownes, But this conquest was got with the losse of much bloud, for of the Florentines two hundred twenty three men were wounded, and 35 slain in those two combats: which made the Admiral Inghirami to rest satisfied in this voyage with the taking of two gallies, after which hee returned to Ligarn.

We have formerly made mention in the lefuits bufineffe, being prefented at Conftantino-D ple, of the Emperors Embassadors entry into that city : and this was the effect of his Embasfage. The peace concluded at Situa Torok, Anno 1606, betwixt the Emperour and the Sultan, was fomewhat altred by the divers interpretations and explications which they made of thearticles therin contained; but this year 1616, in the month of March, the Embassadors of both their Imperial Maiesties assembled at Vienna : namely the Cardinall Forgassie Archbishop of Strigonium and Chancellor to the Emperor, Cardinal Kleffel Bishop of Vienna, the Baron of Rainek, Count Adolph Althem, the Earle of Solmes, the Earle of Thoron, and Paul? Appeni Naci, for the Emperor : Hali Balla of Buda, Achmas Tybaia, and Gafter Graffiani for the Turk. Where they concluded these following articles, to take away all pretext of controuerfie, in the explication of those which were agreed vpon at Situa Torok. But it was after that E Embassadors had been sent on either side, as well to Constantinople as to Prague, with royall and rich presents.

Articles extracted out of the Letters Patents of Achmat Emperor of the Turks.

An Accord for the execution of the Articles touching the villages in controuerfie, and the rating of fortifications.

O conclude all differences touching the division of Villages, and demolition of fortifications made in presudice of the peace of Situa Torok ; we the Commissaries deputed had agreed upon the time of four moneths. But for that all controversies cannot be decided within that time, by a common consent we have concluded the time of twelve moneihs, for the expedition of all that hall remaine undecided; all things remaining in the same estate during the time. For the ending of these affairs on the behalf of the Marefly of the Roman Emperor, Shall be fent the noble Lord Adolph of Althem Earle of the facred empire, with others according to his Maiesties good pleasure. And on the behalfe of the Othoman Emperor hath been named the noble Lord Ali Vifier Baffa.

For the greater assurance of these things, we the said Commissioners have caused six copies of shis treas ty to be dispatched in the Italian, Hungarian, and Turkish tongues. And we the director or President of the pring Councell to his Imperial Maiefly, and Cardinall, with other Counfellours of bis pring Conneell, and Commissioners, having full power and authoritie, have confirmed these presents under our bands and the seals of our arms.

As also we Ali Bassa of Buda, Visier to the most powerfull Sultan Achmat, Tyhaia Mutafataga, and Gaiper Gratiani, Embaffadors for the Turkish Emperor with the Imperial Maiesty of the Roman Emperor having full power and authoritie to conclude this treaty, have figned is with our hands, and fealed it with our ordinary feals : wher of there were three copies delinered to either party. Ginen at Vienna the first of March, 1616.

This new declaration of the Otheman Emperor, vpon the field Articles concluded at Situa Torok, shewes plainly how much the Turks are of latodaics refined from their antiene barbarisme and rudenesse, having made themselves capable of great affairs. And these frequent meetings betwixt the Emperor of the Romanes and the Sultan, by their Embaffadours, as an G holy watering of the Olive tree of peace, seemes to make it so flourishing, as the sweet savour may pierce farther, and make vs hope that God wil make vse of this peaceful vnion, to prepare vnto himselse some means for a new haruest, or a healthful conquering of soules, wandring a Prince Coresky bu wife carried into Tartary.

Alexandrina wife to prince Goresky, having bin taken at that vnfortunate overthrow of the Polonian Princes in Moldauia, by Skinder Boffa and prince Michna; the was carried away (as you have formerly heard) by a Tartar captaine, and led captive vinknowne to Bialigrot, where the received many indignities being with childe; yea during the time of her lying in beeing flue or fix months after her taking, All which time she bethought her selfe of a means to baften her own deliuery, and withall to free a Polonian foldier called laques, who had bore arms H under prince Coresky. This man although he knew the Princeffe well, and might by her difeouerie haue purchased his own libertie, yet he would not do it : wherfore the Princesse hauing tried his fidelitie, taught him a meanes how to work his owne libertie, and hers in the end, by his care and diligence. The Tartanone day being absent, Alexandrina took occasion to talke with this laques; telling him, That having found him faithfull vnto her, the would direct him a course wherby hee might redeeme himselse out of captinitie, so as he would principally obferue what the did prescribe, laques having promised to execute what soener this lady should enjoin him, though it were to the hafarding of his life; the then faid vnto him, You know the Tartarian whose captiues we are hath an elder brother a very rich man, who of late is become blind and deaf, by reason of a great catarrhe and defluxion which is fallen down into his eyes. I and ears wherwith his brother feems to be much afflicted. I have a jewel which my Lord and husband gaue me when we were made fure; the which I have kept carefully, hiding it sometimes in my hair, fomtimes in my old tatterd rags which I have worn fince my captivity; the which I have much efteemed, for that my deare spouse assured me, that the stone which was fet in this jewel had many and fingular vertues; and amongst others, that it would restore the fight which was lost by defluxion, and cure deafnes, so as it were not natural or too inueterate. I am resolved to take out the stone and deliver it to thee : afterwhich thou mails sound the Tattarian, whether he wil fet thee at libertie if thou curest his brother; making him sweare folemnly not to retain the stone, but to suffer thee to carry it away, to the end thou mayst restore it vnto me without his knowledge. Having resolued vpon this plot, the lady said vnto K him, You must also demand of the sick man an horse and some mony, with pasports to go into your country, to the end thou mayst go speedily to my deare husband, wherefocuer thou shalt hear of him, and deliuer him my letters and bring mee an answer if it be possible. laques hauing sworn to perform what soeuer the lady commanded him, beeing at libertie, the princesse deliuered him the stone, he swearing to restore it vnto her again so soone as hee had done his cure, if it were not taken from him by violence.

The Polonian attended with impatiencie, vntil that the Tartarian did talk vnto him of his brothers infirmitie:who finding him one day much afflicted, took occasion to tel him, that he knew a certain means how to cure his brother without any pain, or taking any thing inwardly. I beleeve nothing (replied the Tartat) for all the physicians in the country canot do it: but if L he could effect his faying, he promifed to fet him at liberty without ranfom, and to give him wherwithall to conduct him into his country. It is the recompence (faid the prisoner) that I meant to demand, and that you fwear vnto me by your great God, not to faile of your promife when I have performed mine, and not to detain, nor fuffer any one to take from me the thing I shall vie in the cure. The Tartarian having solemnly sworne, and laid his right hand upon his heart, the Polonian took a time to make preparation for his cure. The Tartarian although he distrusted his new physician, yet he acquainted his brother with the project; who beeing desirous to recouer his sences, increated his brother not to neglect the offer, promising to save him harmlesse, both in respect of the ransom which he expected from the Polonian, and the mony he should give him. The day appointed being come, the Tartarian press his prisoner to M perform his promise. To whom the diseased man also promised an horse, with 50 chequines to return into his Countrey, taking the same outh which his brother formerly had done. All things being now readic, hee applied his physicall sone; bisding it fast vito one of his eyes for the space of seven hours, after which being taken away he flow cheerly; and in like manner he recousered his other eie, and afterward his hearing by the like application. Where the Tartars much rejoiced, giving vato the Polonian what they had promifed, and procuring him paspores from the Gouernor, without which he could hardly get out of the country.

The Polonian before his departure told the Tartarian captain that he had a fort which him, toget frebuts which was, That the Polonian woman which was also his prisoner was his neet kinswoman, intreating him, that in respect of his good office he had don vnto his brother, he would vie her and her little infant better, & that as foon as hewere returned into his country, he would take a course for her ransome, and perhaps would bring it himself. The Polonian having acquainted the Lady with what had past, and deliuered her jewell faithfully vnto her, having received B her letters to prince Goresky, and wowed to find him out he took his leave. This Polonian trauelling toward his country met with one of the same nation, who having bin taken prisoner with prince Alexander, made an escape. These two discoursing freely of their aduentures, Isques inquired carefully what was become of the princes who had bin caried prisoners to Constantinople by Skinder Baffa, and especially of Coresky; and hearing that he was in the prisons of the Black fea, he inquired by what means he might speake with this prince, or at least how he might conusy some letters vnto him. To whom he answered, that it was very difficult, for thathe was streitly garded ; but he understood that the French Embassadour had sometimes leaue to fend tovisit him, wherof he might inform himself more particularly. After this, Idques entreated his countryman to deliuer certain letters which the princesse had written vnto her kinsfolks; the which he promised to perform faithfully, and so they parted. I aques comming to Constantinople, grew acquainted with one of the French Embassadours men, who was sometimes implored to visit the Prince, & cary him mony & other necessaries ; by whose means he had acceffe to the Prince, and deliuered his letters, the which he received very joyfully, hearing of his wives health. Eight daies after, the Polonian comming to vifit the prince he receited from him an answer to his wife, & so took his leaue: who after many troublesome incounters returned to Bialigrot; where finding the lady all alone (the Tartarian and his feruants being gon a hunting) he gaue an account her of his negotiation, and deligered his ler-tiuitie, under standing that the grand Seignior had refused to put him to ransom. After their D discourse, the Princesse aduertised her faithfull Agent, That since his departure the Tartar grew jealous of her qualitie, and had inquired of her what her husband, her kinsfolk, and their estates were. To whom the had answered, That her husband was a Captain who had been taken prisoner with prince Alexander, and carried with him into Turky; and as for her other kinsfolks they were all foldiers, who had bin ruined during the wars of Moldauia. Defiring the Polonian to remember it well, lest they should be found to differ when they should come to treat of her ransom. The Tartarian returning soone after to his house, he found laques the Polonian there; whom he entertained very kindly, both in regard of the good offices hee had done for his brother, and for the hope he had of his prisoners ransome, remembring that Laques ters, wherat the much rejoiced, hearing that he was alive, though infinitly grieved at his cap-

had told him that the was his kinfwoman, and that it might be he would bring it. After fome little discourse. Lagues asked him what ransom he would require for his Polonian prisoner. To whom the Tartarian answered, That he would have 6000 chequines for her and her sonne, vnleffe he would give him the stone with the which he had cured his brother. To whom the Polonian replied. That as for the stone, it was not in his power, having restored it to a Nobleman whom he had followed when he was taken prisoner. And as for the ransom which he demaunded for his prisoner and her child, it was more than she and all her kindred were worth, shee being wife to a captain who had bin taken prisoner at the defeat of Alexander, and for want of means was still detained. The Tartarian interrupted him, faying, That he vnderstood shee was of noble extraction, and that the had rich kinsfolks, who would not fuffer her to spend her life in captivitie. I confesse, said the Polonian, that she is issued from noble parents, but they are ruined during the troubles of Moldauia; adding withall, that he would not have returned if he had thought he would have demanded about 1000 Chequines, the which he offered him. intreating him to accept it, in regard she was his kinswoman, and for the good office hee had don for his brother. You have bin satisfied, replied the Tartarian, and have no cause to com-

In the year 1 617 there came to Paris a Chlausa Spanish Renegado, called Solyman, fent H from Constantinople with letters from Sultan Achmai to the King, for the delivery of twentie eight flaues, who had redeemed their liberty for mony in diuers ports of Italy, and in their return to Constantinople had bin taken by the ships of Matsailles. The King caused them to be fet at liberty. But the Chiaus had charge alfo to intreat his Maiefty to cause justice to be done vpon the Moores Granadines, expelled out of Spain, and wronged in their goods & perfons voon their passage into France; wherin he had what contenument he could expect of juflice. Norwithstanding he did witnesse openly his amasement at their long delaies, in the dispatch of suits; saying plainly, That France which had the reputation thorowout the world. to maintaine enery mana right inuiplably, did no justice but after long and tedious pursuits a and that the execution of decrees was many times longer than the fuit it felfe. Whereasthe 1 Turks justice (said he) was speedily administred to every man, & within eight daies they saw an end of the greatest and most important suits. This Chiaus was fauorably entertained, and defraied with his train for the space of fix or seuen moneths at the Kingscharge.

As the Turks efface bath not growne great but by combustions, so it is ordinarily full of troubles; wherby it feems the prefernation thereof depends in making was voon others, or to support it, when as neighbour princes seeke to recouer that which they had vniustly wrested from them by the Othoman force. So this great Estate entertained this yeare source great Armies, two at land, the one against the Persian his antient enemy, the other (consisting in a manerall of Tartatians) against the king of Poland, as supporting the part of the Vaywood Moldania against the Turke, who had settled another in that province. And two navall Ar- K mies, the one in the Black fea against the Cossacks and Rassians, who made daily incursions into the Othemans country, a men wholly given to arms, who go to fea in small boats, able to carry but fine or fix men, made of the bodies of hollow trees, but they are in a maner innincible with these kind of boats: for when as the disaduantages of a combat forces them to sound a retreit, they retyre neer vnto the land, and in fuch places where the Turkish gallies cance approch, and so they easily preuent a totall ouerthrow. Finally, in case of necessitie they carry their vessels with them : for in the end of the last yeare, finding the passage of the blacke set stopped at the mouth of the river of Danow, by the Turkish gallies, they put their boats into carts, and taking the way by the mountains brought them easily into the sea. Their sourth army was in the white fea, as they call it, imploied either to conduct the Carsuan which brings L the tribute from Egypt to Constantinople, or in search of the gallies of Malta and Florence, which feour those seas continually to anoy the Turk. The atmy against the Persian was led by Haly Baffa successor to Mehemet Baffa, he who fled into Persia after hee had lost sixty thoufand men in a fet battel; after which being fent for to come to Constantinople, fearing that the Sultan would take revenge of fo great a losse you his life, hee retyred to the Sophy and

The Turkes being much annoyed both at fea and land by the Visoques, made great complaint to the States of Venice, with whom they were in league, being greatly griened at their thefts, and complaining much, that they could not paffe by fea without danger of feruitude or death : adding withall, That these pirats having gotten a way into Turky, by the Venetian M territories, they were by shem made flaues and flain in their own countries, and although they went not from their houses, nor undertook any voyages, yet they were still in alarm and subject vnto ruin. That the fmall refistance which was made gaue great cause of jealousie that these was some secret intelligence betwirt the subjects of the Seigniory of Venice, and the Vscoques, and that they divided the spoyle betwixt them. Finally, that in what fort soeuer the matter past, they held them insupportable to al men, but especially to themselues. The Turks threatned to take their iust reuenge, the which being impossible to effect in the countrey of the Vicoques (for that by the letters of the commonwealth of Venice their passage was stopped) they resolued to be reuenged upon their subjects, and recouer a part of their goods which they had loft. Finally, they prepared to come into the gulph of Venice with a mighty army, the which without doubt had brought that State into great extremities, and been very prejudiciall to many Prouinces of Christendome. But for that the insolencies and thesis of the Vicoques had like to have ingaged the Venetians in a dangerous war against the Turke with B whom they were in league, it shall neither be unpleasant nor unprofitable to make a little digreffion, and flew what these Vicoques were. About the yeare 1550, there affembled together The beginning in certaine plains neere the sea belonging to the Princes of the house of Austria, people (who of the Viceques, were cruell, violent, and infamous) from divers parts of the countrey of Chimera, Dalmatia, and the other confines of Hungarie, and fuch as had been banished from the State of Venice; whose delight was onely to live vpon spoyle and bloud. All these theeres being thus gathered together (whom they called by a generall name Vicoques) as enemies to all art and industry to liue honestly by their labours, retyred themselues into a defart country, receiving no pay from the Princes of Austria who commands there. Being thus by their naturall inclination giuen to spoyle, adding thereunto the spurre of pouerty, nothing mooued them to flay in those places, but all libertie was lest them to rob and spoyle: whereupon they applied all their minds and forces; fo as having made certaine light foifts, they began to make courfes at fea, with the most barbarous and impious crueltie that euer was practifed amongst the Scythians, Tartarians, or any other inhumane Nation what socuer. And for that it is an ordinarie course for any one that will commit a great villanie, to seeke out some goodly pretext to couer it: fo they concluded among themselves, to shadow their insolencies and thests with a colour to goe against the Infidels. Wherefore in the beginning, there were no Merchants. were they Furks, lewes, or subjects to the Turke, although they were Christians, but if they entred into the gulfeither to traffique orto furnish Venice with provision and merchandise, they were taken by them, their goods divided amongst them, and they forced to pay a great

O ransome, or to die miserably. All the ports of the State of Venice, both of Istria, Dalmatia, and the Islands from whence they received their victuals and provision, were soon after thut vp by these pyrats, who not content to spoyle the Turks (which trafficked no more by reason of their great dangers and losse) allured by the rich spoyles which they tooke, and the defire they had to encounter them, they began to fee vpon the Venetian ships, forcing the merchants whom they tooke to confesse by torments, that the goods belonged to Turks, although in effeet their chiefe booty came from Christians, Hauing drawne many vnto them of their owne humors, and thinking their spoyles at sea not sufficient to satisfie their couctous desires, nor the Presents which they were to give to others, to be favoured and supported in the Courts of Princes, they staid not long before they entred with all violence into the Turks countrey, through the Venetian territorie, to whom they were as hurtfull as to the Turks from whence they carried away rich spoiles and many prisoners. There was nothing that was precious, rich. or good, but was subject to the insatiable greedinesse of those pitilesse theenes and pyrats, if passing by sea they came neer vnto the maritine coasts. Whereupon grew the great complaint you have heard made by the Turks, threatning to be reuenged vpon the Estate of Venice for the insolencie of the Vicoques, which afterward bred a cruell war, betwixt that State and the Archduke Ferdinand of Grets, now Emperor, who feemed to support them, thereby to ingage the State in a war with the Turke. But for that the successe thereof doth not belong to our History, we will leave it to them that have written it at large.

On the fifteenth of Nouember this yeare, Sultan Achmat Chan having flued thirty yeares, The death of and gouerned that great Empire of Turky fifteene, died. When hee came to the Empire, he Athmas. was but fifteene yeares old; he was of a good constitution, well complexioned, and somewhat enclined to be fat, strong and active, which appeared by his exercise in casting of a horsmans mace of nine or ten pounds weight, wherein hee exceeded any one of his Court; in memorie wherof there are two pillars fet vp in one of the courts of the feraglio at Constantinople, with G an infeription, as marks of his dexteritie. He was by nature ambitious and proud, which some hold qualities befitting his great estate the was not so cruel as many of his predecessors, but was much given to fenfualitie and pleasure, for which he entertained three thousand Concu. bins and virgins in a Seraglio; being the fairest daughters of the Christians. His mother was a Christian of Bosna or of Cyprus, and therfore it was thought he was somwhat fauorable to Christians. He was much delighted in hawking and hunting; and namely for hawking bee kept in Grecia and Natolia forty thousand falconers, who attended his comming in their seueral places of charge, and had good yearly pensions. Neither were his hunrimen much sewer in number, or of lesse charge. As the Turkish Emperors are bound by the law of their religion once cuery day to practife some manual trade, so Mahomet his father gaue himself to the making of arrows, and Achmas to the fathioning of horn rings fuch as the Turks wear when they draw their bowes. This they do in the morning after they are ready and have faid their prayers, then they call for their exercise; but it is onely for fashionfake: for they scarce make an arrow or a ring in a whole year.

Nought but affliction thundring out of heaven, makes men on earth to any goodnesse giuen. Nor longer than the thunders, any fear that any heav'n holds any Thunderer. So Mustapha, while Heaven restrain'd his state, and held him fetter'd in his brothers hate, To vertuous actions did his studies driue, was curteous, pious, and contemplatine. But when his brother could no longer live. and Libertiedid to him Power giue; Then Pride and Tyrannie his horses were, And drive him alwaies past Heavens love or fear, Greatnesse, on Goodnesse loues to slide, not stand, and leaves for Fortunes ice, Vertues firm land. Mustapha

MVSTAPHA THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, NINTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKS.

Ofmin the eldest son of Achmat beeing not about twelve years old, Mullapha the brother of Achmat being 25, was drawn out of a Cell where he then liued as it were religioutly and in contemplation, and proclaimed Sultan Mu- Mustapha ob. stapha Chan. They write of him, That he grew cruell, cau-tains the km. fing yong ofman to be kept under fure gards, putting his after depoted. brethren to death. Hee also did many indignities to the Christian Embassadours. And to confirme him in his Throne, hee gaue great fums of money to the Ianizaries and Spahi; and fent a meffenger to Vienna to the Emperor, to affure him that hee would maintain inviolably whatsoeuer had bin concluded betwirt him and his deceased brother Achmat. But growing odious by reason of his tyrannie, the grand Visier came out of Persia with an Army and deposed him, forcing him to turn to his cel, fetting prince Ofman at liberty, & feating him in the Imperial throne. But for that it may feem ftrange, that Mustapha should be preserved aline during the reign of his brother Achmat (contrary to the custom of the Othoman Emperors, who do viually kill all their brethren at their first comming to the crown, thinking thereby the better to affore their estates) it shall be fit to make mention therof. Mahomet the third of that name, dying in the year 1602, and leaving Achmat and Mustapha his sonnes by the Sultana Flatra a Lady of Cyprus, some say of Bosna, Achmat the eldest was sent for specially out of Magnesia, by the Basfa's, to take possession of his fathers crown, being the first Emperour of that name. And for that the custom of the Turkish Emperors was (as wee haue said) to haue neither brother nor nephew aliue, vnlesse they could saue themselues by flight; yet the Visier Bassa's and other officers of the court concluded in Councel, That it was not fit that Mustapha brother to Achmat should die: grounding their opinion vpon a good reason of state, For that their Emperor being but fifteen years old, they feared, that dying in his nonage without children able to gouern, the Empire might fall into combustion, and ruine it selse by reason of civil wars: wherupon they decreed, That Mustapha's life should be preserved, but with that caution and restriction, that he should remain still a prisoner in some chambers of the Emperours Seraglio at F Constantinople.

During Achmais minoritie, and before hee had children, there was no cruel decree made against Mustapha, but he onely continued in his contemplation without any liberty. But Aggaga 2

when as the Emperor saw himselse fortified with issue, and remembring the cruel custome of G his predecessors, he many times propounded the putting of his brother to death to his counhis predecessors, he many times propounded the putting of his brother to death to his councill. The which may seem very strange it took not essent, having beene often concluded. A mong others it is written, this his death was concluded the curing and that it should have beene put in execution the pert days that have constant it said for the life ment with appartions and searchild treamer, this morning being come the said. The his time is would putting his brother to death had so terrified him, here the being that his toments would much encrease if he should put it in execution. And the force he by the model, but his brother should live, more in regard of the terrior of his mind, then for any brotherly affect on. In the time Sultan Achmat being in one of the windows of the set of the best his brother windows of the set of the set of his brother windows who have been set of the set of the set of his brother windows who have been set of the set o Mustapha, who by his permission was walking in the gardens with his gard. Some one of the H Bassacs or other officers that were neere vnto him, and willing to flatter his humor, told him, That it was a matter of great consequence to suffer him to have so great libertic. Achmat (mooued with jealousie and distrust) grew into a rage at his words, and thereupon tooke his bow and arrow (being a very expert Archer, as all the Turkish Nation generally are) and aimed at his brother to kill him : but at that very instant he felt so great a paine in his arme and shoulder, as not able to let loose his arrow, nor to perform what he had intended, hee said with a loud voice, That Makomet would not have Mustapha to die. This prince had three chambers in the Seraglio, where he remained a prisoner fifteen years, and spent his time in a contemplatine kinde of life, after the manner of the Mussulmans : his whole delight was to reade the Atabian bookes of their doctors in divers sciences. The grand Scignion gave him 1 leave fometimes to take the aire of his gardens with his Gard, and admitted him of his courfell in divers affaires of state; taking his advice many times, for that he knew him to have found judgement.

After a long imprisonment, and a daily apprehension of death, the Emperous Achmas falling gricuously sick in November, as is before said; the great Bassa's of the Court and other Counsellors about him, seeing the great danger he was in, persuaded him to take some good course for the succession or his Empire. He had children by the Sultana, but they were all so young, that they were not capable to gouerne the Empire. Moreouer, this Sultana was dead, and the children left friendlesse, having none to speake for them. But on the other side, the Sultana Flatra mother to the Emperour Mustapha was yet living, who thought that if the K Baffa's should undertake to gouern the State during the minoritie of the Emperors children, her honour would be much eclipfed : wherfore the fauoured Mustapha, and perfuaded the dying Emperour to make him his successor. On the fifteenth day of November, Achmat seeing his end draw neer, called for his brother and told him, that feeing death approch, he defired to prouide for the preservation of the Empire, and therefore had made choice of him to succeed him; intreating him to take the government upon him presently after his death. Mustapha was much amafed at his speech, and answered him with words full of feare and humility, That he might not accept of the honour which he did him, seeing that the Empire did rightly belong vnto his eldest son. Achmat disabled his son for so great a government, both for his age and capacitic, being necessarie for the maintenance of fo great a monarchie; and said that he I for his ripe yeares and deep judgement, should take upon him the managing thereof: recommending the children he had by the Sultana, vnto him, intreating him to vse them in the fame manner that he had vsed him; leaving the other children which hee had by concubines being his slaves, to his discretion. Soon after these words Achmat died, and Mustaphawas generally acknowledged for successor to the Turkish Empire. Who at the first was so amased, as he had thought he had bin in a dream, to see himselse advanced to so great a power and foueraigntie, from a streit prison and a daily apprehension of death. At his first comming to the empire he caused the Persian Embassiador to be set at libertie, whom his brother Achmat had caused to be restrained, contrary to the publique faith, for that newes came to the Court, of some combustions raised by the Persia. After which, he sent speedily to the Bassa of Bu- M da, commaunding him to entertaine the treaty of peace made by his predecessor with the Emperour inuiolably. Yet notwithstanding, he carried himselfe during the small time of his

A reign infolently and cruelly; for violating the Laws of Nations, he had il intreated the Baron of Mole or Sancie Embassador to the most Christian King, setting gards upon him as a prifoner, having caused his people to be put in prison, and tortured after their maner. The reafon of this indignitie which Mustaphadid vnto the French Embassadour and to his people, grew vpon an occasion which will require an ample discourse, for the better understanding of that which hath gon before. After the ouerthrow and taking of the princes of Moldavia, Prince Concesky, as you have heard, was brought by Skinder Baffa to Constantinople, wherat the grand Seignior was wonderfully wel pleased, for that he was held, even by his enemies, for one of the molt valiant and redoubted princes of Christendom. Wherfore he was fent away prifoner, and confined to the towers of the black fea, which are diftant fine miles from Conftan-B tinople; a place appointed for the gard of prisoners of great qualitie and importance, such as he was. He was shut vp with a French captain called Rigant, in a little chamber which was on the top of one of those towers; in which Chamber there was a window capable for a man to passe thorow, and yet it had no bars, for that the height of the place freed it from al suspition. This Prince was much folicited by the Turk to become a Renegado, as the princes Alexander and Bougdan his brothers in law had don : but hee refifted it with a generous refolution, refoluing rather to die in that tedious captiuitie, than commit so base an act against God and his conscience. The which being made known vnto the King of Polonia, it mooued him to compassion, and caused him towrite to the French Embassador, and to intreat him to be a means that this Prince might be put to ransom, and freed from captivitie, at what price soener. The C which the Embaffador durst not vndertake (although he defired it much) for that hee had no charge from the King his master. The Emperour Embassadour did what possibly he could, knowing how much the liberty of this prince might auail Christendom. For which considerations the Turk would not yeeld in any fort to suffer him to be released; so as the friends of this captine prince were out of hope ener to fee him at liberty. But most commonly in such extremities the Almighty works by the fecret instruments of his dinine providence, & giues affistance vnto them that feare him, when as all humane helpe and hope faileth; as you may understand in the sequell of this history, whence grew the Embassadours affront which hee receited.

About the fame time there had bin a Lady taken out of Podolia, with a fair yong daughter of hers, and a maid feruant, by the Tartarians, who fould them vnto a Turke, and he brought them vnto Constantinople to make his profit. This Lady who was a Christian, hearing nothing from her husband for the space of nine moneths, went accompanied with her daughter to the French Embassadors house which was at Pera, to craue his aid and affistance. Where his Secretary (who was called Martin) mooned with compassion and lone, promised vnto them all service; and afterwards assured the mother, That if shee would promise hee should marry her daughter, he would indeauor to redeem them from captiuitie. Wherto the Ladies yeelded, and passed their promise in writing vnto the Secretary. Whereupon he payd two thousand and fine hundred Crownes for their ransome, and sent them home into their owne Countrey. Being returned, the Lady made her husband and the rest of her friends acquain-E ted, how they had been freed from captilitie, and of the contract of mariage which was past between her daughter and the French Embassadors Secretarie. But the sather did altogether diflike of this mariage, for that Martin, as he faid, was no gentleman, and had not an estate to entertaine his daughter according to her qualitie. The mother aductifed Martin foon after of the fathers refufall; protesting vnto him, that he alone was the hinderance. And as for the mony which he had disburfed for their ransome, they would fend it vnto him if he pleased to Constantinople with interest. Martin was much discontented, and divers letters and expostulations passed between them, but hee could not obtain the execution of his desire, and their promise: whereupon he grew full of griefe and melancholy, and thereupon went to visit Prince Coreskie, who was in the blacke tower, to make his complaint vnto him, and to take his aduice, what course he were best to follow. Hee made his excuse, That hee was sent by his mafter to carry the Prince some mony, as he had don at other times. Who making the prince acquainted with his discontent, (for that he knew these Podolians, and had formerly allowed of the suit which he had made to this virgin) he comforted him, saying. That if hee might by any means get out of prison, he would willingly supply the defects which they objected a. G gainst him, and would maintaine him against all that should oppose themselves against the accomplishment of his defires. This made Martin study by what meanes hee might free the Prince, to the end he might bind him to succor him when he was at liberty; and Loue, which is many times the author of many goodly inventions, suggested one vnto him which was very fubril, and difficult to execute: which was, to fend vnto Prince Coresky a bottom of packthred in a little pic, which hee fent him with other meat, aducttifing him by a letter, That vpona certain night concluded betwixt them, he should put downe the packethred at his Chamber window, wherunto a ladder of cords should be tied, by the which hee might descend from the tower. The which was afterwards punctually effected, not by Martin himfelf, but by a Greek Priest who lived in Constantinople, to whom hee had imparted his enterprise, and had inga. H ged him vpon hopeof great reward from the Prince. In the mean time Martin, doubting that he should be suspected to practife this escape, resolued to be gon, and took leave of the Em. baffador, whom hee gaue to understand, That hee had some present vigent affaires which did presse his speedy returne into France; and therfore he lest the execution of his designe to the Greek priest, who failed not at the time appointed to do as the Secretary had directed him. Printe Coresty, The Prince having drawn up this ladder of ropes with the help of his packethread, and beeing come to the foot of the tower with his chamber fellow, he found the Greek priest attending for them; who told him that he had charge from Martin, to conduct them to a certain Cane which was is a great rock a league from thence, where they must remain all that day; and that in the cuening he would not fail to come vnto them, and bring them habits like vnto his own 1 that being so disguised, he might conduct them to his lodging in Constantinople, and there conceal them fo long as they should think fit. This deuice pleased them wel, and so they went all three vnto the faid caue, wheras the two camrado's hid themselues, and the priest returned

At the break of day, it being the 23 of November 1617, some of the gards entring the prifoners chamber, faw that they were escaped, and found the ladder of ropes which they had vied, tied to the window, wherat they were much amaied, knowing wel that they should imate for it. Notwithstanding he who had the charge of the prisons, sent speedily to Constantino ple, to glue notice of their escapes, So soon as this was known, they sent posts speedily to all parts, to make inquiry for these sugitives, especially at the ports and passages, giving them K special charge to observe all men that passed, if there were not one of them who had the little finger of his right hand thrunk vp, as Prince Coresky had by a wound which hee had received Within few daies after, the Turk feised vpon the servants of the Baron of Sancy or Mole, Embassador for the French, torturing two of them after their manner; which is to lay the party vpon a rable on his belly, and to give him three or four hundred blowes with a staffe vpon the foles of his feet, the calues of his legs, and his buttocks: yet could they not make them lay any thing that might charge their mafter, as these Turkish tormentors did hope. Not contented herewith, they did as much to a poor Turk, who was a weauer by trade, and dwelt neer vnto the Embassador; thinking to force him by this cruel torture to depose falsly, that he had seen the Secretary Martin going and comming to his masters lodging vntill the time of the prisoners L escape: but God would not suffer the weaver to depose any thing but the truth, notwith sanding all the miferable and cruel torments which hee had fuffered. The which is worthy the observation, for that the Turks do generally hate the Christians mortally, and do greatly rejoice at their disasters. As for the gards of the towers, some of them were impaled, and some were pouned or beaten to pieces in great iron mortars, wherin they viually poun their rice to reduce it into meal.

Three daies after, the Chiaus Baffa had charge to feife vpon the person of the French Embaffadour; the which he performed very seuerely and vnciuilly, without any respectivntohis qualitie. Having taken him, the faid Chiaus led him vnto the Visier Bassa's Bouse; where having beene examined upon many circumstances touching the escape of the prince Corney, M The learning they left him as a prisoner in the hands of the faid Chiaus, where hee continued for the space bastadour un- of three daies. During the which time, the faid Embassador desiring to write to some of his princed by the friends, and also to speak with the Musti, which is the Turks high priest, to acquaint him with his iust grieuances, he could obtain leave, but by giving two thousand crownes unto his laylor. True it is, that this present made the Chiaus tel the Embassador, That if he would obtain any fauor from the Mufti, he must procure it with mony. According to which addice he gaue three or four thousand crowns; wherupon the Musti became tracable, acquainting the grand Seignior Mustapha with the Embassadors iust complaints, and of what importance his detention was, seeing there was nothing found to charge him, that he had favored the escape of the Prince Coresky, as it was suspected; and that his Secretary who had practifed it for his owne priuat profit, had lest his master aboue ten or twelue daies before the said escape, with an intent, as he faid, to return into France. Finally, That all the world would taxe him to violate the law of Nations: and that no Christian prince nor other would herafter put any confidence B in him, and it was to be feared, that they would all joine together, and make war against him. And in truth the Embassadours, both the King of Englands and the Low-Countries, were much discontented at this vnworthy vsage of the French; protesting openly, That if he were not speedily set at liberty, they would retyre themselves into their countries. All which confiderations represented by the Musti, mooued the grand Seignior to command, that the sayd Baron of Mole or Sancy should be sent back vnto his house without any further displeasure. But all this could not free his houshold servants from their imprisonment, but he was sorced to pay two or three and twenty thousand crowns for their redemption; else had they beene so tormented, as that their lives had been in danger: for fothey were threatned. Soone after, the grand Visier hearing of the tyrannous gouernment Of Sultan Mustapha, returned from Persia C with his whole army toward Constantinople, where he forced him to leave the Empire, and to retyre into his Cel, having reigned but two moneths and some odde daies.

But to returne to prince Coresky, whom wee left with Captaine Rigaut in the lodging of the Greeke priest at Constantinople, wheras they lay hidden for the space of two moneths, vntil that their good host got leave from the Patriark of Alexandria, as well for himselfe as for two others (who he faid were of his societie) to goe and confine themselves in the defarts of the Archipelagus, with many hermits who lived there after the maner of the antient Anchorits. Having gotten this leave and pasport, they imbarqued, being disguised like priests, and arri- Prince cores. ued at EtcHut, where they found an English ship teady to set sail for Messina in Sicily: from escapes from whence he went by land to Naples, where he made himselse known to the King of Poland his constantingto Embaffador, who was wonderfull glad of his liberty, leading him to the duke of Offuna, then Viceroy of Naples, who furnished him with all things necessarie, and a good convoy to go to Rome; where the Pope received fingular content to fee him, and to hear of his strange adventures. OSMAN THE FIRST OF NAME, TENTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKS.

Rince Ofman beeing fet at liberty by the Grand Visier, 1618. hee caufed him to be proclaimed Sultan, and feated in the Imperiall throne of the othomans, with the generall applitue of all the Baffaes and army. The French Em. The French baffadour beeing by the fatto meanes freed from this Confunctionics guard, aducrtifed the King his Master, how barbarously he had beene entreated by Mustapha, entreating his Majetty to reaoke him from that charge. Whereupon the King fent two Gentlemen to Constantinople to the new Emperoilr Ofman, to demand reparation of the indignity done to his Embaffadour and Secretary; and to let him vnderstand, that hee could not fend any other Embassadour to his Court to condole the death of Sultan Achmat his father, nor congratulate his comming to the East, vatill that he had received farif-D faction from him befitting his dignity, and the wrongs he had received in his Embassador. The Grand Viller and the Muphti hearing this Embaffie, and confidering of the actions which had passed, aduised the Emperour Ofman to send an Embassador to the most Christian King to confirme the league, and to teftifie both by words and letters how much he was difpleased for his discontent.

The Grand Seignior by the aduice of the Visier and others, fent Pri Chiaus into France, to confirme the articles of peace betwixt the French and the Turks. At his first audience he presented a Letter vinto his Majesty with this superscription.

To the most glorious and puissant Prince of the Beleefe of Icsus, arbitrator of all the differences which happen among the Christian Nations, and of all the most noble, and the most antient, the Emperour of France, to whom we wish the end of his daies to be happy, and his defire accomplified.

Now, that I fend water you the capitulations and treaties of peace which are between our majesties : Ofmans letter giaing you to understand, that there is not any thing firme or stable in this world, neither King nor to the beams beggar although they line long: that which pleafeth God cannot faile. If all mens defires should succeed. without doubt all men would goe to beauen. Manwhat focuer he douth, or in what die min focuer hee be, shall not remaine in this fraile life, wife men know it, and it is apparent to the learned. By that which we have faid, we defire to let you know that he who was in health, but he encountred death, and is gone to a goodlier place, to Paradife, my father Sultan Achmat Chan; the God which hath no refer blance bauemercy on him. No man shall remaine in this lying World: And in Paradife are the approches to God, where there is no death. Finally he is gone.

Since the beginning of the Othomans untill this prefent, the empire of my fathers and their countries from father and sonne, from hand to hand, and from father to sonne, the inheritance comming so unto G grom favor and jonne, from mande Chan, for that he was elder than our felfe, was preferred before vs to the throne of the Ottomans, and was some daies in peaceable possession of the Empire, yeelding juflice equally to all men both great and small. But as he was shut up many yeares in secret places, praying vuto God continually, fo of himselfe he hath relinquished the dignity of the Emperour, and contemped it. The Empirethen belonged to those of our high linage, and for that by right it should come unto me, the Almighty God by his infinite bounty and mercy hath restored it intomy hands, my Vissers, Bassas, Licutenants, the Mufti, and other great personages, and they that are in any respect with me: and finally, all my subjects and vassals, by a generall consent have acknowledged me for Emperor, in the happy yeare 1027. About the first day of the Moone of Ianuary, in a good houre. Wherefore I amsented in the ereat throne of the Othomans, like water that of Solomon, a powerfull and able Emperor: And in all H our countries and cities, all the Mufulmans being affembled together in their churches to preach, the greatness of my name hath beene proclaimed, and through all the mints of mine Empire they have granen it in their stamps, to come pieces of gold and silver. Finally, whereosoever there are any Musulmans, and in what places there are men my name shines like gold. Hereafter injustice nor impiety shall have no place but justice shall be done equally. Now we are in joy, and for that our natural disposition is good, and the antient friendship betwint vs is perfect, I therefore thought good to advertise you of all that hath puffed here, and to fend you one Letters of Imperial alliance by Vreiu Chiaus who to my antient fermant, having had the managing of my treasure, whereof he hath given me good account, being arrived at your Court, carrying my faid Letter, he deserves to be received with honour: swearing and protesting agains with you, to observe in all points the full capitulation made betweet my predecessors, and your great I grandfathers, and for our part, you may be affured, that the faith promifed shall be maintained as it bath beene heretofore by our predecessors. And from the day I entred into my throne, I have made my will knowne to all the Viceroyes, and other officers which do my justice, and generally to all those of my obedience, entreating you to give the like commandement to your Governours of Provinces, and other officers of Instice, as in like manner to all your subjects. And as your grandfathers have taken the faith of our high family, fo it may please you to continue with me, and we defire on both sides it may be good and firme. Know then that for my part it Shall be observed, so as of your side there be nothing done contrary to the promised faith. And if before we came unto the Imperiall throne, your Embassadour which did your affaires bath received any distaste, and bath not received the honor and friendship accustomed, in my time he shall be the more honoured and respected as the chiefest Embassadors have beene: I have commanded that be shall be greatly favoured, and our respect shall be unto him as Quinco, that is to fay, Gold, and doubt nothing of it : for I do certifie you.

The French King having received by this action a full fatisfaction for the indignity done unto his Embassador: soon after he, called the Baron of Mole or Sancie home into France, fending the Earle of Sezi to fucceed him as Embaffador at Constantinople..

A battell be-IN Xt the Inres and the

The war continuing still betwixt the Turks and the Persians, the grand Visier was sentto inuade Persia with a great army, where after many exploits of war, newes came to Constantinople, that the Visier had gotten a great aduantage vpon the Sophy of Persia in a battel which had beene fought, wherein there had been 100000 men flaine. And although the Turks loft L the greatest number, yet they remained masters of the field, and spoiled the Persian campe, who was retired or fled. For that the manner of the Sophy is to fight with the Turks inretiring or giving way a little; and with this manner of fighting they have alwaies made head against the Turks. After this ouerthrow the Visier advanced with his army, and entred far into Persia, which made many doubt that his returne would proue difficult: yet soone after there came letters to Constantinople, importing that the Turks being in Persia in great distresse for victuals, the Sophy had sent an Embassador to the Visier to demand peace, promi-Aprace conclus fing hereafter to fatisfie the tributes of filkes which he ought yearely voto the Turke; and that the Visier (in regard of the necessity of his army) had accepted his offer, and granted him peace, the which Sultan ofman did afterwards ratifie. After the conclusion whereof, the So- M phy fent many Cammels loaden with victuals unto the Turks army, which was in great di-

During the Turks war in Persia, vpon the anniuersary day of Sultan Achmat, there appeaouer Conftanred in the night a Comet ouer the city of Constantinople; in forme like a crooked sword, A or Turks scimiter: and it was so great as it extended from the meridian neer vnto our zenith, unto the horifon: the point began to shew it selse an houre after midnight, and then it appeared little and fomewhat whitith, and gaue but a glimple, after an houre it was more apparant and of a deeper colour, and the more it did rife, the redder it was, and like vnto bloud; but at the breake of day it vanished by little and little in the light: And it was so big when the point approched neere ento the zenith, as the hilt was hidden ender the horifon; the Mathematicians did observe, that it followed the motions of the heavens; it did alwaies rise in one place, and the bending of the faid fword was towards Crates, more Southerly than it. It did appeare directly in the East a quarter towards the South, the point comming directly towards Constantinople, and the blade extending it selse to the said East a quarter to the South, B which is justly the part where Perfia is feituated. The edge looked directly rowards Constantinople, the which made men difcourfe diverfly, and many were amazed, fearing that it did figuifie the loffe and defeat of their army in Perfia, whose returne they feared much.

Fri or Unffeine Chiaus having finished his Embassie in France, came into England with the like charge, and had audience from his Majesty at White Hall, Sir Thomas Gluer being Interpreter, from whom I received a true discourse of his whole speech, as followerly,

The Interpretation Verbatim is this.

Most happy Emperor, as I have with mine owne hands, bowing my selfe to the dust of your Princely sect, appresented unto your excellent Majesty the most mighty and high Sultan Othoman my Lord and Master his Imperial Letter, so likewise I most humbly beseet your Majesty, that you will be pleased in conformity thereof, to vouch safe your Princely answer by your noble Letter, and to deliver the same into the hands of me your slave: and be ever partaker of all blessednesses and happinesses.

A Copy of the Letter of Sultan Osman the present Othoman Emperour, written to the Kings Majesty, and presented by Husseine Chiaus.

Lthough in this transitory World, if the King or the begger should enjoy the longest terms of life A that might be, and obtains all that his heart could wish, yet it is most certains, that in the end he must depart and be transported to the Word eternall and it is well knowne unto the wife, that it is impossible for manto abide for cuer in this World. The occasion if this prologue is, that the immertall, omnipotent, and only God hath by his Divine will and pleasure called unto himselfe our father of bleffed memory Sultan Achmat Chan, who in life was happy, and in death laudable; and departing out of thu mementary World to be neerer the mercifull Creator, being changed into perfect glory, and eternall bliffe, K hath his habitation on high, and his rest in Paradise. This paternall Empire and Monarchical king dome hath almost untill this present blessed time, beene alwaies hereditary, from grandfather to father, from father to son, and so cursively on that manner; but having regard unio the age and yeares of our great and noble Vncle Sultan Mustapha, he was preferred and honoured to sit on the Othoman Throne, and being settled for some time, tooke care for the affaires of the Empire, and for all that might concerne the people both in generall and particular. But having beene many geares retired in solitarinesse, and given to denotion and Dinine obedience, being also as it were wearied with the cares of the Empire, of his swite accord withdrew himselfe from the Gouernment; for that the Diademe and Scepter of the Empire of the senen Climats, was the true right and inheritance of our most excellent Majesty of the which with the meeting and consent of all the Visiers, and other Deputies of State, of the Primat of the Musulman L Law, and of the other honourable Doctors of the fouldiers, and of all the subjects both publike and privat, the Almighty God hath made an high Present and worthy gift unto us. And in the happy day in the beginning of the Moone Rebea il eucl of this present yeare 1027, in an expected time, and in an acceptable houre, was our bleffed and happy fitting established von the most fortunate Othoman Throne, the feat and wifedome of Solomon. In the pulpets of all the Mosques the congregations of the faithfull, and denotion of the Mussulmen, throughout all our dominions is read to our Imperiall name the * Hutbeh. And in the mints (where innumerable summes of mony are couned, as well upon the silver as the gold) our happy name and stampe is signed. And our most powerfull commandements are obeyed in all the parts and dominions of the World. And the brightnesse of the light of the Sun of Iuflice and equity, hath caused the darkenesse of injuries and molestations to vanish away.

Now seeing it hath beene an antient custome of our famous Predectsors to give notice of the same vnto such I rinees as are in sincere friendship, and do continue it with the House of great Majesty and our Imperiall Court: We also have written these our princely Letters, and appointed for their Bearer the choice among his equals Husseine Chiaus (whose power is great) one of the honoured and respected

A servants of our magnificent Port, therefuge of the World, to the end that such newes might eause great joy of our most honourable assumption. And we doe hope that when they shall come to your hands (in conformity of the well grounded friendship upon the sure league, articles, and writings which hath been established of old with our most royall Race, and permanent Empire) you will manifest infinite joy and gladnesse, and certifie as much to the Rulers and Courrnours of the Dominions and Countries under you, that they may know the articles of the peace and league, and the points of the oath which are sirme and to be desired on both parts, from the time of our grandfather and predecessour of royall stocke now in paradise (whose soule God enlighten) undoubtedly during the time of our reigne shall be observed with all respect. And let there not be the least imagniation of any want of due observance of the signes of friendship on our part, or by any manner of meanes on your part, for the violating the foundation of the peace

Othe courteous Lord of the Nation of the Melliah, both great and honourable among the people of lefus, and the true determiner of the Christian off aires , our good friend Paul Pinder, the English Embassador, whose later daies be with all felicity. To whose noble presence (after our many kind falutations tending to all good affection and manifestation of joy worthy and beseeming our friendship) our louing aduice is this, That if you defire to heare of our estate and being you shall we derstand, that after we departed from the happy port with the army for the wars of Afia, we arrived and wintered in Melopotamia, and remouing thence in the Spring with all the Musfulman hofte (alwaies victorious) we went to Van from which place until we came to Tauris, the Musfulman army went on alwaies sacking and destroying all those places and townes of the Persians which we met withall by the way in those parts, where were burnt, pillaged, and rained, some thousands of willages, and tormenting all those people that came to hand. And when we were come neere to Taurus, the Generall of the Persian forces (of peruerse religion) called Carelgai Han (the accurred) retired himselfe into the said Tauris, where beating up his drums in every quarter, he made a shew that he had a will to fight: so we sent a little before we some Tartars and others of our army to hearken out and take notice of the enemy, who meeting with feven or cight hundred Persians of note, put them to the sword, very few escaping, and that with very great difficulty and hazard. By which the faid Generall finding himselfc unable to resist the power and fury of the Mussulman hoft, or to flay any longer in the faid place, the very fame day that we arrived there, the faid Generall bauing spoiled all the city, fled away; so we tooke the place, ransacked it, and burned all the buildings towers gardens, and what focuer elle we found within it : And thus the great city Tauris by Divine fluour and grace became ours. Then forthwith we fent after the enemy, the Tartar with some Reglerbees, who ouertaking them gave them battell; and albeit some of ours did fall, yet they which fell on the enemies side E were innumerable. And logoing forwards towards Erdeuil (their obscure residence) about ten days journy in the country, we went burning and spoyling it, and killing all the Persians that we met; that indeed there was somuch glory and honour won, as that all the antient men of the country do affirme, there was never feene the like : insomuch that from the confines wat o Erdeuill, twenty daics journey of the country was on that manner by us destroied. Thus afterward the King caused to empty the said place of Erdeuill, and fled into a place called Hulchal, and canfed his army to go to the top of a high mountaine, from whence haning fent three or four times men of quality wnto wt, feeking and entreating for peace, with promife to Que yearely unto our Emperor a hundred Somes of filke, and all fuch places as are upon the confines gotteninthetime of Sultan Solyman, except Der Ne and Der Tink ; wherewith we weare contented with the peace, and his Embassador is upon the way comming toward vs. And so we returning the same F way againe (alwaies spoiling) we came to Erzirum. And this our present Letter is written unto you for the respect and preservation of our friendship : and even as our amity hath ever beene hitherto sincere and firme, so likewise by the Grace of God at our arrivall in the happy Port, it shall be in like manner maintained and continued that more cannot possible be. And so God keepe you in health.

The wars growing hot in Bohemia against the Protestants, and the Emperour raising what G forces he could to suppresse them, the directors or Gouernors of the country wrote their let. ters to Bethlem Gabor prince of Transylvania, to acquaint him with the estate of their affaires. Towhom he made answer, That his country standing even in the very jawes of the Turks, whole councels were neuer quiet, but euer working like to the wates of the vaft ocean, and al. waies watchfull toembrace all occasions upon any discord of the Christians, especially now when they had pacified all quarrels with the Persian, and had no rebels in Asia, against whom they might employ their forces; he had propounded to himfelf to attend the confent and fauor of the Otheman Emperour, whereby he might take from him all occasion to make any irruption into the neighbour countries, and have the better means to imploy his best means to reconcile the discords among the Christians; wherefore having sent to Constantinople to H acquaint the Grand Seignior with his intent, and to craue his fauour, he received letters from thence the 17 of August, whereby he was assured of the Grand Segniors consent and sauour, Wherupon he resolued (notwith standing the opposition of the house of Austria, the Pope of Rome, and others of that faction) to take arms in defence of the Bohemians; promifing tobe in September following vpon the confines of Morauia villeffe he found fome stay in Hungary. Being aduertised of the state of Bohemia and Morauia, he leuied an army at Clausenburg, and entered into the upper Hungary, whereas most of the Barons submitted themselves unto him; only Humanoic a great man in that country opposed himselfe; but not able to make his party good, he fled into Polonia, After which he fent his army (being x8000 ftrong) and took Filek, Ternan, Vacci, Nouigrade, and others; after which he feifed vpon Neuheufall, the Go- I uernour being deliuered bound vnto bim. The Palatine of Hungary wrote letter to Redei Generall of the Prince of Transylvania's army, withing him to consider what the forces of the Kings of Spaine and France were, with the house of Austria and their allies, and that the Electors of the Empire (some excepted) would send aid voto the Emperor. Who answered, that he doubted not of the power of those Kings, and that the Electors would send supplies vnto the Emperour; yet hoped that before they came, all should be ended, and their dinners should be prouided.

Soone after, the Prince of Transyluania came to Presburg with his virmy, a towne of note in Hungary, whereas their Kings are vsually crowned. The newes thereof comming to Vicina, they sent 3000 souldiers with three pieces of ordnance downe the river of Danow, who kentred the suburbs on the 13 of October, the night was very stormy and rainy, and the Transyluanians taking this opportunity charged them, and slew the greatest part, their Commander slying away with some sew. The suburbs being taken, Bethlem Gabor sent to the Palatine, to know whether he would yeeld the town and castle without force, siting him some time to resoluc; who after consultation with some noblemen, they resoluted to yeeld, and so the towne was delivered into his hands. After which he sent part of his army under good Commanders into Austria, to the gates of Vienna, where they committed great spoile, the particular relation whereof I leave to the History of the Emperours lives, to which it doth properly belong.

In Nouember Bethlem Gabor Prince of Transylvania, and the Estates of Hungary, sent Embassadors to Prague, where they propounded divers articles vnto the Counsell, and amongs L others, That they should joyntly send Embassadors to the Grand Seignior, & that the prince of Transyluania should negotiate the businesse. And for that the kingdome of Hungary was much exhausted, whatsoeuer should be taken in Stiria, Carinthia, and Carniola, should be united unto it, to the end it might be the better able to relift the Turke: all which tended to the prejudice and ruine of the house of Austria. The Prince of Transylvania having taken diuers townes in Hungary, belonging to the Emperor as King of Hungary, and entred Austria in hostile manner in fauor of the Bohemians; knowing that hee had thereby much insenced the Emperor, and the whole house of Austria, and that if he should preuaile ouer the Bohemians, the whole burthen of the war would lie vpon him, he therefore in the end of this yeare fent an Embassador with presents to Constantinople, to craue assurance of the Grand Seigni- M ors aid and support (vpon whose fauour he had alwaies depended) in case the Emperor should inuade Transyluania i where being countenanced by many of the chiefe Bassaes, he had assurance of Sultan Ofmans support and protection, the which he confirmed by a solemne oath under his hand, as followeth.

The Great Turks oath to Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Transylvania.

A

By the grace of God unconquerable Turkish Emperonr, sweares by the Highest, Almightiest, and Almighty Gods Holineste, by the Kingdome, by the substance of the Heauens, the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, by the earth, and by all under the earth, by the braines and all the hairy scalpe of my mother, by my head, and all the strength of my soule and hody, by the boly Great Mahomet, and by my Circumcision, That I thee my brother and son Bethlem Gabor, succeeding King of Hungary, in no manner brought to nothing, untill there shall be no more left but my selfe, or foure or five Turks at the most, yet will I be still obliged to defend thee, and all those that do any waies appertaine unto thee. And it thou wisched me, I will be alwaies ready to goe with thee. And in case this my promise shall in any what source belongeth unto me, and gather it together time a rocke of stone, or substance of earth, and that the earth may cleave assume and swallow me up body and soule.

Dated at Constantinople the fifth of Ianuary, 1619.

Bethlem Gabor being affured by this oath, of protection made by the Grand Seigniour, in the beginning of the yeare 1620, he called an affembly of the Estates of Hungary at Prefburg, whither Embassadours were fent from the King of Bohemia, and the States of that 1620 countrey, with the incorporate Provinces, where a perpetual league was concluded betwixt A League bethem, and afterwards concluded at Prague; where among other articles, it was concluded, the thoraction of the transfer of the Concluded and intibuttonic transfer of the Turke, therefore a new Embassie should be sent to the Grand Seigni-Hugarians, our from all the confederate Kingdomes and Provinces; and that Bethlem Gabor should take

D you him the chiefe care of that businesse; but yet in such fort, as the Bohemians and incorporated Provinces should fend their Embassadours with the Hungarians, and beare their shares of all that should be disbursed, as well for the Presents, as for the Embassadours charges.

In lune following, Bethlem Gaber went to an affembly of the Estates of Hungary at Neuheusall, where he propounded divers heads vnto the States: That he desired nothing more than to restore the Kingdome of Hungary, so miserably afflicted, to liberty; and that they might enjoy their religion and priviledges: That hee had spared no cost for the lawfull defence of the country; and for a testimony that he defired peace, he had refused the Crowne which the Estates offered him at Presburg: that the ground of peace was to maintaine the E league which they had begun with the Bohemians : that hee had alwaies defired peace with the helpe of other Princes, fo as it were fincere and without fraud or deceit, for the obtaining whereof hee had affisted his confederats miserably affliced: That he knew for certaine the Emperour desired not peace but war, having suffered the Cossackes to enter into Hungary, and to spoyle many places with fire and sword, and denied passage for the Embassadours of Bohemia and Austria; for this cause they were not now to treat of peace but of warre, and to consult how it might be begun and maintained: for the leaving of money which is the finewes of war: for the furnishing of their forts vpon the frontiers, and for the speedy sending of Embassadors to the Turkish Emperor, lest being ingaged in an intestine war, there might be some attempts made upon these bordering forts. Having delivered his minde unto the F Estates, there came divers Embassadours thither from Bohemia, Austria, Silesia, and Lusatia, Venice, Poland, and Turky: The Venerian Embassadour was content their Commonwealth should enter into the league, and the Turke made offer to conclude a perpetuall league

Betblen Gabor proclaimed K. of Hungary,

On the flue and twentieth day of August Bethlem Gaber Prince of Transylvania was pro-claimed King of Hungary by the Palatine, at the instance of the Turkish Embassadour, and with the constent and applause of most part of the Estates of the country: after which he levied a great army of thirty (some say fifty) thousand horse and soon, and made many Ensignes with divers Emblemes and devices; which being knowne, the Prorestants of Vienna, with the constent of the Emperour, wrote vnto him, humbly entreating him to spare the city and country, for their innocent wives and childrens sake: but in the meane time all the citisens were commanded to make provision of victuals for six moneths.

A vision scene at Asedina Talnabi.

There came newes to Constantinople of a strange apparition or vision, which was seene at Medina Talnabi in Arabia, whereas Mahomet their great Prophet was buried: to visit whose tombe the Turks vse to goe in pilgrimage, but they must first goe to Mecha, which is H some sew daies journey off, and there they take a ticket from the Grand Seigniours Beglerbeg, else they are not allowed to goe to Medina. This vision continued three weekes together, which terrified the whole country, for that no man could discouer the truth thereof. About the twentieth of September, there fell fo great a tempest, and so fearefull a thunder about midnight, as the heavens were darkened, and those that were awake, almost distracted; but the vapours being dispersed, and the element cleare, the people might reade in Arabian Chara cters the fe words in the firmament, o why will gee beleeue in lies ! Between two and three in the morning, there was feene a woman in white compassed about with the Sunne, having a cheerefull countenance, and holding in her hand a Booke : comming from the Northwest, opposite against her were armies of Turkes, Persians, Arabians, and other Mahometans, I ranged in order of battell, and ready to charge her; but the kept her standing, and only opened the Booke, at the fight whereof these armies fled; and presently all the lamps about Mahamets tombe went out; for as foone as euer the vision vanished (which was commonly an houre before funne rifing) a murmuring winde was heard, whereunto they imputed the extinguishing of the lampes. The antient pilgrims of Mahorts race, who after they have vifited this place neuer vie to cut their haire, were much amased, for that they could not conceiue the meaning of this vision : onely one of the Deruices (which is a strict religious order amongst the Turks, like vnto the Capuchins amongst the Papists, and live in contemplation) stepped vp very boldly, and made a speech vnto the company, which insenced them much against him, so as this poore priest for his plaine dealing lost his life, as you shall K heare.

A Dernice 39 freed Unto 39 the Turkes. 33

The fumme of his speech was this: That the World had never but three true Religions, euery one of which had a Prophet; first God chose the Iewes, and did wonders for them in " Ægypt, and brought them forth by their Prophet Moses, who prescribed them a Law, where-, in he would have maintained them, if they had not beene obstinate and rebellious, and fal-, len to Idolatry: whereupon hee gaue them ouer, and feattered them vpon the face of the " earth. Then presently after hee raised a new Prophet, who taught the Christian Religion! " This good man the lewes condemned and crucified for a feducer of the people, not moved " with the piety of his life, his great miracles, nor his doctrine. Yet after his death, the pres-" ching of a few fishermen did so moue the hearts of men, as the greatest Monarchs of the world Li ,, bowed to his very title, and yeelded to the command of his Ministers. But it seems they " grew as corrupt as the Iewes, their Church being dismembred with the distinction of the Bast ., and West, committing Idolatry againe by setting up of Images, with many other idle core-,, monies, besides the corruption of their lines, so as God was weary of them too, and not onely " fent divisions among them, but for sooke them, dispossessing them of their chiefest Cities Ic-" rusalem and Constantinople; yet God is still the Governor of the World, and provides him ,, selfe of another Prophet and people, raising our Great Mahomet, and giving why no our nati-,, on, fo as no doubt we shall be happy for euer, if we can serve this God aright, and take the ,, ample by the fall of others. But ahlas! I tremble to speake it, we have erred in coorpoint, ,, and wilfully broken our first institutions, so as God hath manifested his wrath by suddent M " fignes and tokens, keeping our Prophet from vs, who prefixed a time to returne with all " happinesse to his people, so as there are now forty yeares past by our account: Wherefore ,, this strange and fearefull vision is a prediction of some great troubles and alterations.

A For either the opening of this booke in the womans hand, doth foretell our falling away from the first intent of our law, whereat these armed men departed as consounded with the guilt of their owne consciences; or else it signifies some other booke wherein we have not yet read, and against which no power shall prevaile: so as I seare our religion will be proved corrupt, and our Prophet an Imposter, and then this Christ whom they talke of shall shine like the sun, and set up his name everlassingly. Hitherto the company were silent; but hearing him speak sololly, they charged him with blasshemy; and knowing their law, which makes all blassemy capitall, they presently condemned him, and having the Beglerbegs consent and warrant, they put him to death.

As their rage against him was violent, so their execution was extraordinary, for they neit the provide the cut off his head nor strangled him, as they vivally doe to malefactors, but they tortured put to distibility by degrees: for stripping him sirst naked, they gave him a hundred blowes on the soles of his seet with a flat eudgell, untill the bloud issued forth, the poore priest crying continually on the woman that opened the booke. After which they tooke a bulls pizzle, and beat all his body until the sinues crackt, and in the end they laid him upon a wheele, and with an Indian sword made of sinews, they brake his bones to pieces, the poor man crying to the last gaspe, othou woman with the booke, saue me, and so he died: At which time there was a searefull tempest. The Beglerbeg sent certain Spahies to the port of Sidon to imbarke for Constanting.

ple, to the end they might aductife the Emperor of these tidings.

Sultan Ofman from the first enterance into his reigne was freed from all cares of forraine war, or intestine combustions; for hee had that happinesse (being himselfe young, and not able to gouerne so potent an estate) as by the counsell and assistance of Hall Bassa his grand Visier, he had forced the King of Persia to demand a peace, and to pay the tribute which had been formerly promifed. His tebels in Afia were all pacified, and the truce with the Emperour (which had been somewhat interrupted by missinterpretation, or the practise of bad misnisters) was newly confirmed a little before his comming to the crowne, onely Moldauia had beene the theatre of war for some yeares, where his father had exercised his armes, and imployed his forces, to advance whom he pleafed to be Vayuod of that countrey, against another party that was supported by the Polonians, as you have formerly heard. Michna Prince of Valachia, being made Vayuod of Moldania by Achmat, and the Polonian party wholly D ouerthrowne in the yeare 1616, hee enjoyed it not long; but whether hee died of a natural! death, or fell into difgrace with the Grand Seignior, I do not reade: yet I finde that after him there was another Vayuod or Prince of Moldauia, who is yet liuing, but in difgrace with the Sultan, his name is Galparo Gratsiani : and to the end you may vuderstand, that the Turks never respect the birth and quality of any man in their advancements, I will relate what this man was, from the mouth of him that knew him very well.

This Gasparowas borne at Gretz (a towne of great strength belonging vnto the Archdukes of Austria, by the which a branch of that house is distinguished from the rest, and whereof the Emperour now reigning is the head) but being a man of small fortune, and little expechance in his owne country, he went to Constantinople, and put himselse in service with Sir E Thomas Glover, before that he was Embassadour for his Majesty to the Grand Seignior, under whom he learned both to write and reade the Turkish tongue. After which he came with him into England, and there by his recommendation was employed to Constantinople for the redeeming of young Sir Thomas Sherley, who was then a prisoner among the Turks. Hauing performed his charge orderly, and being come to Venice with the young Knight, hearing that Sir Thomas Glover was fent Embaffadour to the Grand Seignior, he left Sir Thomas Sherley, and went to Constantinople to his old master, where he was emploied yearely to buy or exchange Christians for Turks, carrying the Christians into Italy, and so returning Turks for them. About the end of Achmats reigne arriving at Constantinople with a ship full of Turks which he had exchanged he acquainted the Visier Bassa with the good service he had cone vnto the Grand Seigniour, who demanding of what countrey hee was, and his breeding, asked him if he would vindertake a service which should be for his advancement, which was to go vnto the Emperour to reconcile all difficulties concerning the peace, wherein he carried himselse so discreetly, as Commissioners were appointed, who concluded all difficul. G ties, as you have heard. But before his returne home, the Grand Seigniour was dead; yet he prefied the Bassa for the performance of his promise, desiring him, that he might be made Vayuod of Moldania, which the Baffa effected: but the presents he gaue advanced him more than his merits. Since hee grew into some disgrace; so as the Grand Seigniour making choice of another Vayuod, gaue charge to certaine Capigies, to go into Moldania to strangle Gasparo, and that they should take foure hundred Turks upon the frontiers to assist them. But Gaspare having good spies at Constantinople, who advertised him of their designe, resolved to prevent them; wherefore taking some troups with him, he met them upon the way, and cut them all in pieces; then returning to Yas, hee flew a thousand Turks. After which he fled into Poland with two thousand horse; from whence they write that he hath made divers in. H cursions into Moldauia, and committed great spoiles vpon the Turks, being affished by the Coffackes, and keepes possession of the country, although there be another Vayuod madeby

The Turks preparation to armics.

Sultan O sman seemes to be much insenced against the Polonians, as well for this support, as for former quarrels, making it his colour for the leuying of the greatest army that hath beene scene since that Solyman went vnto the siege of Agria, consisting, as it is said, of three hundred thousand men, having drawne downe all his forces out of Asia. God knowes where he will imploy it, but it is much to be feared that he will make vse of this division betwirt Christie an Princes, who should vnite their wills and forces, to oppose them against the common enemy of Christencome, who watcheth only to get an aduantage, little regarding his word and promife.

The Turke having no imployment for his forces by land, fent threefcore gallies by Sea, to make some enterprise voon the Christians. They came into the Mediterranean Sea, and having coasted the Island of Sicilie, they sent twenty gallies to land in the Kingdome of Naples, where they surprised the Towne of Manfredonia, and spoiled it, carrying away source teene or fifteene hundred captines, and fo retyred againe to Sea. The rest of their fleet lay about Vellona in the gulfe, which made the Spaniards jealous that the Venetian had been acquainted with this enterprise. And fince there is newes, that the Gallions and Galliots of Algiers, haue taken Iuifa, a small Island of foure miles compasse, neere vnto Majorca: It isa place of great importance, for that it hath a hauen able to containe much shipping ; for the guard whereof the King of Spaine entertaines a great garrifon, and it did much annoy them of Algiers. They tooke the towne; but it is not yet certaine whether they have taken the castle.

The creatneffe of the Turks Empire.

This is all I could learne of the Turks affaires fince the yeare 1609 vntill this prefent. The Reader may observe, that fince the reigne of Ottoman their first Emperor, this great Empire of the Turks is proudly built upon the foure Monarchies of the World; that is to say, of the Assirian, Persian, Grecke, and Romane. For they enjoy Babylon, and all Chalde, with the country of the Medes: We have seene them in Tauris the capitall city of Persia, Greece is subject to the yoke of their command; Constantinople, sometimes called New Rome, by the transport of the Imperial seat, is now made their Throne, and so many provinces L and realmes which in former times depended upon the Romane Empire, do now acknowledge their power: they are Masters of the Realmes of Ægypt and Cyprus; the Islands of Rhodes, Mitylene, Negrepont, Chio, and many others acknowledge them, the Empire of Trebifond is theirs; the Realme of Colchos, now called Mingrelia, payes them tribute: they of Tunes and Algiers in Affrica obey them; Dalmatia, the Illyrians, Triballiens, the countries of Transyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia do them homage, and we see them command euen in the chiefe townes of the Realmes of Hungary: But all this power of the Ottomans had neuer bene so great nor so searefull, but by the discord, division, and bad intelligence betwist Christian Princes, as you may reade in the course of this History, as well in Greece, at Constantinople as in other parts of Europe, whereas these Princes contending one with M another, haue furnished matter and meanes to the Tuske to dispossesse them of the chiefe pecces of their Monarchies. They measure the continuance of their Empire by the

A discord betwirt the Princes of the beleese of the name of lesus, and they confesse truely, that this division is the onely cause of their greatnesse, the which hath made them beleeue, that among Christians there was a bad Angell enemy to peace, which they call, The strong or powerfull Spirit, which kindling the fire of reuenge and ambition in the hearts of great men, drawes from their affections the good of their beleefe, to entertaine them in perpetuall difcord; during the which, they promise vnto themselues a firme and an assured reigne. So the Musti, and the Talismans praying on Friday in their Mosques, demand of their Prophet the circumstance of this bad intelligence betwirt Christian Princes, to the end they may enjoy the Empire which they have vnjustly vsurped. Yet their prophecies doe not promise them a perpetuall possession; behold one in their owne tongue, which hath alwaies made them feare B the vnion of Christians:

Patisfahomomos ghelur, caiferun menleker alur kenzul almai alur kapze iler ie di yla- 4 tartish degb Giaur Keleci esikmasse on ikigladegh on laron Begbhgheder. That is to fay;

Our Emperour shall come, he shall possesse the Realme of an Insidell Prince, be shall take the red apple, and make it subject to his power : if at the sewenth yeare of his command the Christians sword doth not aduance, be fhall rule unto the twelfth yeare, he shall build houses, plant wines, compasse in gardens with bedges, and beget children : but after the twelfth yeare that he hath held the red apple, the Christians (word shall appeare and put the Turks to flight.

By the Infidell Prince they understand a Christian Prince (for so they call them) and by the Theesposition Red Apple an Imperial towne ftrong and important; in the which, and elsewhere the Turks of their Proshall build houses: that is to say, connert holy temples to the vie of the Mahometan impiety: phesic. D for by this word to build, they that have commented upon this prophefic, understand ufurpation of the houses of God: Plant vines, by these words they fignifie the extent of the Turkish Empire, and the fetling of their colonies, as we fee in Hungary and Transylvania: Compaging in Gardens, that is to fay, they shall fortifie the townes which they have taken from their enemies: Beget Children, extend the Mahometan religion far in the Christians countries. But after thetwelfth yeare; &c. within a certaine time belk knowne to God, his divine Majesty, opening the eies of his elemency upon the Christians, will unite the wills of their Princes, kindle their affections with a holy zeale, and bleffing their armes, will make them victorious ouer the Turke, whom he will banish out of the Hast, and chase into Scythia, from whence they came to be a feorige vinto Christendome. These are my wishes, wherein I hope all good E Christians do concurre.

Having runne over the occurrents which have happened in the Turks estate for the space The beginning of eleven yeares, I must according to Master Knolles his method, conclude the worke with of the Turkija a description of the Grand Seigniours Port or Court, of his Government, Officers, Riches, Empire, Force, and Religion. The Turks (a people of Scythia) having like a violent deluge overthrowne a great part of the East, and taken divers Provinces, being expelled from lerufalem by Godfrey of Bouillon, and the Christians, their remainder retired to Nicea where they lived without any head or fouereigne commander, untill that Ottoman about the yeare of our Redeemer 1300, by practife made himselse sole and absolute Monarch. His sonne conquering divers Provinces, removed his Imperiall feat to Prusia, now called Bursia, the chiefe F abode of the Kings of Bythinia. Amurath the first (being drawne in by the Emperour of Constantinople to succour him, and allured with the wealth of Europe) turned his armes against him, taking divers provinces and townes from him, amongst others. Adrianopolis, which he made the seat and residence of the Turkish Emperours, in the yeare 1363. But Mahomet the Bbbbbb 2 fecond having taken the city of Constantinople, and expelled the Emperour in the yeare G 1453, he made it the royall feat of the Othomans, for which he had great reason, being one of the fairest and sweetest seats of the World.

Defeription of Conftantinosle

Constantinople hath in circuit by the opinion of some Writers fifteens or sixteene miles, and is called by the Turks themselues Stambull or Stambolda, the sea beating vponityp. on the North and South fides: Towards the East it is divided from Asia by a large channell, which runneth from the one sea to the other, and is about seuen miles in length, The City is built upon the declining of a hill, in which there are many rare fingularities which I omit being described elsewhere. There are in this City seven little hils, upon the which are built seuen principall Mosques or Churches, by seuerall Emperours, where of the sairest and most stately is that of Sultan Solyman. Vpon the North side of the City standeth H the Grand Scigniours Palace or Seraglio, commonly called by the name of the Port: The which hath on the one fide thereof the Sea, and of the other fide of it the hauen, the other two being towards the City, being about three miles in compasse, some write of source. It is walled about, and within it are many gardens, orchards, medowes, and woods. Being entred into the first Port (which hath double gates of yron) into a large Court, on the left hand there stands a building like vnto a Turkish Mosque, which now the Grand Seigniour vseth for a flore house, wherein are great store of armes which are for the desence of his Sergelio. And on the other fide of this Court are seuerall gardens walled in, from which they passe to another Court with a gate like vnto the former, where are targuets and scimitars hanging, and many Porters attending, as at the former. After this, they paffe into another large Court which is planted with Cypresse trees, and full of grasse, where deere feed; but round about it is a cloifter which is in length about fix hundred and fourescore foot, and about five hundred in bredth, paued with stone, and covered with lead, it being supported with one hundred and forty pillars of white and gray marble, standing vpon basses of copper, with capitals of the same voon the North side whereof stands the Dinano, whereas the Visier Bassa and the other Baffaes fit in Councell, and heare causes of importance, whereof we will stundameter- speake hereafter. In this Seraglio the Grand Seigniour bath many chambers which are richly appointed, wherein hee remaines, and there he hath fix young men which attend his person, and the service of his chamber, whereof two wait dayly, and at night they watch when hee fleepes, the one of them at his head, and the other at his feet, with two torches x burning in their hands. In the morning (as Sanzouino Writes) when the Grand Seigniour attires himselfe, they put into one of his pockets a thousand aspers, and into the other pocket twenty duckats of gold, the which if he give not away that day, is their fee at night, neither (as they fay) doth hee ever put on the fame cloathes, and whenfoever hee goes to hunting, or to any other exercise (besides the money which hee hath with him) his Casasdar Baffa or chiefe Treasurour still followes him with great store of money to give away. The office of these fix young men (who are changed as it pleaseth the Grand Seignious) is diffinet, for the one carries his shooes, the second his bow and arrowes, the third his vest, the fourth a vessell with water, the fifth carries a feat, and the fixth called Oda Bassa is head of

The chiefe offi-

Sugniour.

He hath dayly a great number of persons resident in his palace, imployed in their severall ects of this braife charges, fome in one place, fome in another, under their feuerall commanders. Butamong all the great men in the Court these are of chiefest eminency and note.

First the Capi Aga, that is to say, the mouth of the Grand Soigniour, by whom the Sultan speaketh to such as haue any great suit vnto him : for no Embassadour is admitted vnto him, but at his first arrivall when he delivers his letters of credit and his presents, and when he hath any businesse to treat of, he repaires to the Visier Bassa or his Aga.

The & cond is Cajnadar Baffa, the chiefe Treasurour of the houshold, or superintendent of the Treasuror.

The third Chilergi Baffa, chiefe cupbearer.

The fourth is Seraglio Agasi, steward or master of the houshold.

The fifth is Chiller Agali, or Saraidar Bassa, Querseer of his Seraglio of concubines, who is alwaies an Eunuch as the rest be.

The fixth and last is Bostangi Bassa, chiefe Gardener, and overfeer of all his gardens, Captaine of his lamoglans, and stearer of his Barge when soeuer he goeth by water. He hath a Protogero or Lieutenant, and many gardeners under him, which are called Bostangi, who when they come out of the Seraglio, become Ianizaries, Solacci, or Capigi, according to

These six Officers of the Sultans house aboue mentioned have no authority out of his palace, yet the greatest Bassaes stand in awoof them, and seare them, for that they have free accesse vnto the Sultan, and have dayly opportunity to insence him against them: for by their fecret fuggestions and false informations, many of the greatest Bassaes are many times suddenly and undeseruedly cut off in the height of all their pompe and glory. Hee hath many mutes or dumbe men attending about him, whereof eight be his dayly The Salton companions and play fellowes in the Seraglio, in whose company hee takes great delight:

belides many others to the number of forty, which attend vpon him as pages. They are all borne deafe and dumbe, yet by long practife they grow fo perfect, as they will understand any thing that shall be acted unto them by signes and gestures; and will themselves by the gefure of their eyes, bodies, hands, and feet, deliuer matters of great difficulty, to the great admiration of strangers.

M

The Grand Seigniour hath within his palace a Seraglio of young men to the number of A Seraglic of fine hundred, from eight yeares of age to twenty: these are the well fououredst and best pro. Jeans min. portioned of all the tribute children which hee draweth from Græcia and Natolia, and they C are chosen out of his Scraglio's at Pera, Adrianopolis, and other places, and brought to this to be bred vp, where they are instructed in diuers Arts, according to their disposition, but especially to reade and write, and in the doctrine of their Law, and to ride, there being a great number of horses kept within this Seraglio for their exercises, and for the Eunuches. They neuer goe out of the Seraglio till the Sultan thinkes them to be of fit age to vndergoe some charge, and then he makes them Spacoglani, or Silichtary, and to some he giues greater places, according to their valour, or the fauour they have gotten with him.

He hath in like manner about fourescore Mutaserache, that is to say, Launce bearers to the They that carry Grand Seigniour: which carry his Lance when soeuer he goeth to field, and acknowledge no bullanner. other commander, and in time by his fauour or their merits, are made Captaines.

He hath alwaies aboue one thousand Eunuches entertained in seuerall places, whereof the saltant fome of them are invery great credit with him, and can preuaile much: they are called Hu- funnither. durni, many of them are employed to attend his Concubines and Virgines in his Scraglio. They are not only depriued of their genitors, but in their youth they have their whole privities smoothed off by their bellies, and in their turbants they beare short quils of siluer, thorow which they make water. This inhumane custome wes first invented by Sultan Solyman, who feeing a Gelding make offer to couer a mare, grew suspitious that they were able to do some fmall thing, notwith standing the losse of their genitors.

The Grand Seignior hath a Seraglio for his women without his palace, in the which there The Sulvans are alwaies foure or flue hundred young Virgines, the fairest of the Christians children, which Scratte of be gathered vp out of Græcia for tribute. The Sultan repaires sometime thither to make choice of fuch as he shall like best for his pleasure; wherof they are adversifed the day before by the Bunuches, that they may prepare themselves in their best habits to give him content. Being all in a roome, and standing voon either side, the Sultan enters, attended by an Eunuch or two, and viewes them; to her that hee likes, he casts a handkercher, (where of he hath many hanging at his girdle) and in this maner it may be he makes choice of halfe a dozen, the which his Eunuches observing, they put them presently into a Coach, and are carried into another little Seraglio within his palace. In this Seraglio they have good entertainement and are apparelled in filke twice a yeare, and are taught to make divers works by antient matrons, and attended on by the younger fort. They have many Eunuches with their Aga or Captaine, and they have one hundred Capigi's and Ianizaties, which keepe their gates. When as the number of these Virgine slaves decreaseth, and they have not wherewithall to supply them with their tributary children, they fend to the market in Constantinople, where they fay there are dayly ten thousand slaues of all ages and sexes to be fold: and there they buy the fairest they can get, but they will not have them aboue eight yeares old, lest they should be G

As for the other Seraglio within the Sultans palace, there remaines the Sultanaes with their children, and fuch other Concubines as he hash made choice of for his delight. Hencuer marries, but when any one is brought vnto him, he gives her an attire for her head of gold. and ten thousand aspers, causing her to line in a chamber apart, encreasing her dayly maintenance. The first that beares him a childe, is called Sulsana, and is mistresse of all the rest, and most fauoured by him, as the chiefest of all his women, the rest as they are fauoured by the Prince, are brought vnto him to haue his pleasure, and then returned backe againe: if they chance to be with childe, they are put into the number of the Sultanaes, and are much refpeted by him. Such as the Prince hath had the vse of, but no children by them, are given in mar. H riage to his slaues, who are advanced to dignities, and made Governors of countries.

He hath three hundred Sollacchi, which march continually about his person, and make as Haguera, Jose his guard, being under the command of the Aga of lanizaries; they are richly attired, having lawne garments hanging downe beneath their knees, and ouer it a quilted wastcoat with halfe sleeues of taffata, damaske, or fatten, and on their heads, caps and feathers like voto the Captaine of the Ianizaries, and they attend on him with bowes and arrowes. He hath also still about him when he rides abroad forty Peichi, that is to say, sootmen or postes which runne wonderfull swiftly, and are still at hand to attend his commandements, where hee shall please to employ them they weare long coats of cloth of gold, with a broad girdle of the same. and caps like vnto womens thimbles, with a horne of filuer and gilt standing vp before. There are about foure thousand Capigi's or Porters which continually attend his palace and Seraglioes, they are attired like vnto the lanizaries, and have over them three Capigi Baffaes, These men are many times employed to execute the Grand Seigniors commandements, when he will have any great mans head, or his throat cut, as we have feene of late yeares in Gamba. lat Baffa, and in Naffuf Baffa, who was Grand Vifier to Achmas.

Ibe Turks go. uerament.

The Grand Seigniors gouernment is fo absolute, as they all tearme themselves his slaves, and no man how great focuer can affute himfelfe of his estate, no not of his life, but by the Great Turks speciall fauour. He commits the mannaging of his estate to such as haue abjured the Christian religion, and have been brought by way of tything in their infancies from Greece and Natolia, and afterwards for their merits are advanced to great dignities, as Baf. K facs, Beglerbegs, and fuch other. The Prince hath a court or Councell which they call Diuano, and this is held within the Seraglio foure daies in the weeke; that is to fay, Saturday, Sunday, Munday, and Tuesday, where they treat of matters of State, and afterwards of the affaires of private men. To this councell are admitted the Grand Visier, eight or nine Bassass who are called Visiers, and are continually resident at Constantinople, (for there are many more which are employed abroad in the conduct of armies or government of Countries) the Beglerbegs and others. At the rifing of the court or councell, the Grand Visier informes the Sultan of all the proceedings in particular; wherein he dares not diffemble, for that the Prince hath a window joyning to the Diuano, where he may heare and fee any thing and not be seene. He seldome impugnes what they have resolved, vnlesse it be to moderate some rigorous fentence, or to give answer to some Embassadour, and what he himselse concludes is irreuokeable.

The Tarks

Their fuits are very short, for they have no advocats to breed delaies, as they have in Christendome; yet commonly he that bribes most speeds best; for the Turks are the most conetous and corrupt Nation in the World, neither will they do any man a kindenesse without $ fee; and yet they are not fure to enjoy any thing they get no longer than it shall pleafethe Prince. They punish crimes with great feuerity, and speedily, the fact being prooued, which doth so turrifie them, as by the report of such as have conversed long there, you shall seldome fee a murder or a theft committed by any Turke; and if any foule fact be committed, it is most commonly done by the Gracians.

The Grand L'ifer.

The chiefe of the Grand Seigniors Councell is the Grand Visier, who we ares the Princes fignet, and is as it were the Lieutenant Generall of the whole Monarchy: he hath authority ouer theother Baffaes, and they are bound to yeeld him an account of their imployments.

A He is still about the Prince his person, and is not sent abroad for any employment, vnlesse it be for an important war, as they have done of late yeares against the Persian. When the Vifier is fent abroad, he makes choice of one of the Baffaes to be his Lieutenant and to execute his authority, and he is called Chimacham.

Next vnto the Bassa (which is as much to say as great Lord) follow the Beglerbegs, and The Bassacher haue their places in court next vnto them. They are men of great authority, and haue the command of great kingdomes and armies, under whose obedience are divers Sanzacks which are sent as Gouernors into Provinces during the Princes pleasure. These are men of great experience, and haue command ouer the Spahi, and Timariots, the Turks chiefe forces on horsebacke, whom they call continually to exercise their armes. There is one Beglerbeg of Greece, which hath all the countries in Europe in the Turks dominions under his charge, and this is the first of all the Beglerbegs, who hath under him aboue thirty Sanzackes. There are fix other Beglerbegs in Asia, whereof the first is he of Natolia or Asia the lesse. He hath the gouernment of Pontus, Bythinia, and other Kingdomes, and hath under him twelue Sanzackes. The Beglerbeg of Caramania with seuen Sanzackes. The Beglerbeg of Aladulcy, under whose command are seuen Sanzackes. The Beglerbeg of Amazia and Toccato, having source Sanzackes. There is also one in Mesopotamia, and under his command twelve Sanzackes or Gouernours of Provinces. There is likewife a Beglerbeg of Damas, Suria, and Iudaea, who bath under him twelue Sanzackes. And there is one of Caire, who commands ouer fixteene Sanzacks, his charge extends to the Arabians, but they are not so obedient as the Turks other C countries.

As for the Turks forces, they confift of horsemen, sootmen, and sleets at Sea. His horse-Thegreat Yarts men confift of Spahi, Timari, Spachoglani, Silictari and Olofagi, who have affignations of loren. lands for the entertainment of them and their horses. For no man can enjoy any possessions, but he is enjoyned to entertaine a certaine number of fouldiers proportionable to the reuenues of the land: so as the Gouernour or Bassa is alwaies bound to haue this number ready to march when they are called. Of these Timariots they are able to raise about an hundred and The Timerless. fifty thousand horse alwaies ready at the first call, for the which the Prince disburseth not a penny; for in regard of the land which is alotted them, they are bound to maintaine themfelues, their horse and armes in the war. Wheresoeuer the Turke conquereth any country, he D divides it among his foldiers; affigning 4000 afpers yerely (which is little aboue ten pound sterling) to every one for himselse and his horse, and so proportionably if he have more land. These horsemen are much pestered with armes when they go to war: for they have a jacke, a speare with a little white banner, a caliner hanging under his left arme, a cimiter, a bow and arrowes at his girdle, and a battleaxe at his faddle bow. And of these kinde of hossemen they fay there are 80000 in Greece, besides an infinite number in his other countries. This Turkish Cauallery worke two great effects, for they ferue as a support to his estate, to suppresse all seditions, and they are ready to undertake any enterprise. Besides these, he entertaines many horsemen about his person, whereof some are Spahi, and these are Christian slaves bred vp The Spahi, yong in the Princes Scraglio, who by their merits attaine to that degree, and afterwards to E greater dignities. They are alwaies attending about the Princes person wheresoener he goes, being commonly thirteene hundred.

The Caripices are held for the flower of all his horfemen, being in number about eight hun- The Caripical dred, who march still about the Princes person during the wars. The Spachoglans which is as & spachoglans much to fay as young menon horsebacke, are about three thousand, who have yetely pensions in mony, which they are bound to receive yearely at Constantinople, or else they are held as dead men. In the wars they march on the right hand of the Grand Seigniour, and are knowne from the Spahies by the banners of their launces, which have two points and of divers colours, the others being painted and all white, but they are armed alike. They are men at armes of a good fashion, and are commonly advanced by the Sultanto higher places. They have a Captaineor Aga of great effeeme, with a Lieutenant, and every twenty have a Boluch

The Salichtari are also horsemen, and lodge upon the left hand of the Prince, being in nam-the Salichtaria ber about three thousand: Their breeding is like to the Spahi, and there is no difference betwixt them but in their march, the one having the right hand, and the other the left, which G is the more honourable among the Turks. The Olofagi.

There is yet another fort of horsemen, which they cal ologagi, being about 2000 in number, and they march on the right and left hand of the Prince. These several troupes are as it were a nursery for all the chiefe officers of that Empire; out of which they doe commonly chuse their great commanders. Besides, they have their mercenary soldiers called Aleanzijs, which come to serue the Turks from Tartaria, Valachia, and Moldauia.

The lanizaries

As for his foot forces they confist chiefely in lanizaries, into which number they have not and their bree- vied to enroll many of Afia, whom they have held faint hearted, but those of Europe, who haue alwaies had the reputation to be valiant. Their manner to entertaine this discipline, is, to fend every three yeares into all the Provinces of Europe, from whence they bring ten or H twelue thousand Christian children as a tribute, making choice of such as have any shew of magnanimity, agility, or courage, which are parts fit for a fouldier. These children being brought to Constantinople and visited, some of them are sent into Natolia, Caramania, and other Prouinces, to dig and weed the ground, where they forget their parents, countrey, and faith, and learne the language and vices of them with whom they converte, and so become Mahometans. They continue in those places three or foure yeares, without any charge to the Prince, being entertained by them for whom they labour; after which time they are called home, and put into the Sultans Seraglio's at Pera, Adrianopolis, and other places. But they that have the best faces and are most active, are reserved for their Princes service.

These children being brought into the Princes Seraglio's, are of two forts; the one are called Aiamoglani, that is to fay, simple Boy : they are instructed by seuere masters in diversma. nuall and paincfull exercifes, as shoomakers, gardeners, and such like base trades. Their secding and apparell is very meane; and for the most part they lie in great and spacious roomes, like vnto religious men, having a light continually burning, and guards about them. These haue liberty to goe abroad, who after the age of twenty yeares are dismissed; whereof some are sent into the Sultans gardens, which are many and great; others are emploied as car men to carry wood, hay, water, and other prouision for the palace, and some are sent to the kitchens and stables; yet when places fall they are preferred to be Ianizaries, and have competent pensions to mainetaine them during their lives. The least hash five aspers a day, and none about eight, and the Spahies ten. They are attired in long blew gownes girt with a broad gir- K dle, and on their heads they have long yellow caps without brims, and sharpe like vnto sugarloues : and of these Aiamoglanes there are alwaies aboue twenty thousand which serue to supply his armies.

The Ich Oglani

The other fort of youths, which are bred up in the Turks Seraglio's or nurferies, are called Ich-Oglani, that is to fay, chamber pages, being the choice of all the Christians children for proportion and fauour, and these are better bred up than the Aiameglani, and come to better preferment, of whom we have formerly made mention; for the meanest places these yong men attaine vnto at the first is to be Spahies, or to attend upon the grand Seignior as his chamberlaines and pages. And many of them having extraordinary parts are suddenly advanced to places of great dignity. Of these the Prince hath euer 5000, who untill they come unto the L age of twenty yeares are neuer suffered to goe out of their Seraglio, nor to see any person but fuch as instruct them and attend upon them.

The Ianizaties (who are the grand Seigniors chiefe (trength on foot) are raifed out of Christians children, bred up in these nurseries, as we have said, where they are taught to shoot with their bowes and arrowes, to vie the harquebuse, and all other weapons fit for seruice; and are at length enrolled among the Ianizaries, and are held the most valiant and resolute souldiers among all the Turks. There are commonly refident at Constantinople and thereabouts twenty foure thousand of these lanizaries when as the Grand Seigniour is there, (for in his whole estate he hath a far greater number) under their Aga or Captaine Generall, which is a place of great credit, but not like vnto any of their Bassas , the great Turke scaring to joyne M power and authority together. Being once lanizaries, they are either fent to the wars, or put in garrison, or else they remaine at the Sultans court (which they call port) where they have certaine spacious places for their dwelling, like to religious houses, where they live under their commanders:

Osman tenth Emperour of the Turks.

A commanders: and the younger ferue the antient with great respect. All the lanizaries of one squadron ear together at one table, and sleep in certaine long halls, and if any one chance to be absent all night, he shall (the next night) be bearen with a cudgell, which he takes so patiently as he kiffeth his hand that hath thus corrected him. They are much respected and seared of all men, and are diverfly imploied in the city; as to fee the peace and good orders kapt, to looke to the prices of things, to arrest malefectors, and to guard the gates. If they buy any thing they will have it at their ownerate; they cannot be judged but by their Aga or Captaine. There is feldome any one punished with death by the course of justice, without darger of a mutiny; and therefore they execute them very secretly. They have many meanes to get mony; for some attend upon Embassadours and keep their houses; others go with travel-B lers, to guard them fafely through the Turks estate. They have a great power in their Princes election; so as to win their loues every new Emperour at his first comming to the Crowne gives them a donative and encreafeth their pay, prefuming vpon their valour and multitude; They many times commit strange infolencies vpon any discontents; as in firing of house, brauing the Baffaes, and fometimes bearding the Sultan himfelfe: as you may reade in this

The chiefe strength of the Turks forces consist in the Ianizaties; and yet there are other forts of footmen, whereof some are called Acouszes, which is a forlorne hope, and receive no Acouses. pay, but march before the army, and have leave to spoile; so as they give the fifth part of their booty to the Prince. There is another kinde called Azapi: these are souldiers of small effect, Acpi. C and ferue rather with the pickaxe and spade than with the sword: they are fitter to tire an enemy with their numbers, than to vanquish them with their valour; and they are accustomed to fill vp ditches with their dead bodies to make a passage for the Ianizaries to ascend vnro a breach. The Grand Seignior hath euer fix thousand Gunnars in pay whom they call Topigi. Topesi and And for the guard of the pouder and shot when the army matcheth, there is alwaies 1 2000 libre.

The Grand Seignior hath also certaine officers attending on him to the number of 3000, whom they call Chiass, which are as it were fergeant at armes. Thefe are men well effected, The chiam. and are often employed in Embassies to forteine Princes: They also carry letters and commendations from the Prince or his chiefe Vister, and they apprehend offenders. These never goe to the warre but when the Sultan is there in person. They are commanded by a Chiaus Baffa, who is of fo great credit with all men (as Sanzouino writes) that when he is fent by the Grand Seigniour to any Baffa, Sanzacke, or Cadi, with order to haue any mans head cut off, he is obeyed, although hee have no warrant in writing, as if the Princewere there himfelfe, and commanded it.

Thus we have let downe the Grand Seigniors forces at land, whole numbers are so great, 76, Tarki dyas in shew they should breed confusion, and ruine themselves, but they keepe very good order capture is their and discipline, so as in that point they yeeld not to any. They live of a little bread baked in armin. the ashes, with rice, and the pouder of flesh dried in the sunne: They may not drinke wine, and there are no women seene in their armies : they observe a wonderfull silence, and all the soul-E diers are gouerned by the becke of the hand or any shew of the countenance. Quarrels and thefts are severely punished. When they march they date not enter into any come fields nor vines. The valiant are affured of preferments, and cowards of punishment.

Having spoken sufficiently of their land forces, let vs see what strength he hath at sea: they haue great store of forests for the building of ships; neither want they good shipwrites, for that couetousnesse hath drawne many Christian carpenters into the grand Seigniors arsenal: And he hath great numbers of men trained up in marine affaires, in regard of the gallies which he hath at Mitilene, Rhodes, Cyprus, and Alexandria, and for the retreat hee gives pyrats at Tunes, Bona, Bugia and Algiers, from whence he drawes commanders and his best mariners, as hath beene seene by experience in the enterprises of Malta, Guletta, and elsewhere.

To maintaine these great forces, it is requisite he should have the sinews of war; yet his of. The Tarters dinary revenues (confidering the large dominions) are not fo great, as in reason they should menue. be: for some are of opinion, that hee hath not about eight millions of gold for his ordinary reuenue; for which they give divers reasons : first, that the Turks have no care but of armes,

There is a third degree of their churchmen, belonging to their law, called Mulli, which are The North, Mar. bishops and chiefe gouernors under the Musty; and their office is to place and displace der francoide. churchmen at their discretion. Next are the Nuderisi, who are suffragans to the Bishops, and their charge is to fee the Cadies doe their duties. Next come the Cadi's who are Judges to punish offendors, of which there is one inevery city vader the Seigniors command.

Vinder these are another kind of yong Doctors of the law called Waipi, who are not so well The Naipi. read as to be absolute Judges, but yet supply their places in their absence.

After these are the Hogi, who write their bookes, for that they allow no Printing and infe. The tieri, calf, rior vnto them are the Calfi, who reade vnto them that write. And the yongest of all are called and s. s.c. Softi, who are yong students or nouices in their law.

These are their severall degrees of lawyers or churchmen: for the Turks are governed by a kinde of Ecclesiasticall law, according to their Alcaron. They have colledges (called Medresse) at Constantinople, and in other places, where they live and study their law and divinity, and so they ascend by degrees to the highest dignity of their profession.

As for their religion, it began in the time of the Emperour Heraclina, when as the Empire The Tarking. was much difmembred by the herefies of Arrius and Nefforius. Mahomes borne in Arabia imbraced this opportunity, feeking to ouerthrow the Dininity of Iefus Christ, which was offpofed by the Iewes and Arabians: he was affifted by two hereticks, the one was Iohna Nefforian, and the other Sergius an Arrian. After which (being affifted by many flaues, to whom he allowed all that was pleafing to the sence and flesh, if they should receive this law) he obtain oned many victories. By Mahomets law they make a distinction of cleane and vncleane meats to content the lewes, and also it maintaines circumcision, but not at the eight day of their birth, as the lewes vie it, but after the eight yeare, when the infant is able to make confession of his faith, where lifting vp his finger he speakes these words, which are granen in their temples in the Arabian tongue: There is but one God whose Prophet Mahomet is, one God and equal Prophets. The circumcifion being ended, they feast three daies together, and then they carry the circumcifed to a bath with great pompe; after which the guefts conduct him to his house, and present him with gifts. The women are not circumcifed, but only speake the words. If any Christian abjute his faith and indure circumcision (as they often doe by reason of their tri butes and vexations) they are led through the towne with great honor, and rejoyeing of the D people, who do alfogiue vnto rhem, and they pay no tributes. Mahamas law denies the Diuinity of Icfus Christ, to please the Arrians who were then powerfull: It is full of tables to please Idolaters, and it giues liberty to the flesh which is pleasing to most men. They confesse one God, and honor tefes Christ, not as the sonne of God, but as a Prophet borne of the Virgin Mary. They neither honor nor allow images. Friday is their Sabbath, 45 Sunday is ours. They observe a Lent of thirty daies, which they call Ramadan; during which they eate nothing in the day time, but when night comes all meats are indifferent, but swines flesh; yet they abstaine from wine and women. They have their Easter called Bayran, which continues three daies, in which they enjoy all pleasures: but this feast is not alwaies prefixed, for that they account not the day according to the course of the Sun, but of the Moone; and E therefore they do carefully observe the new Moone and salute it.

They have no bels in their Mosques, neither do they suffer the Christians which live there to have any. They put off their shooes when they go into their Mosques, and take them again at their comming forth. Wherefocuer they fit in their churches or houses, they have tapestry couerlets or mats under them: they are not much given to contemplation or 'carning, yet the Turkish women being married and having iffue, are carefull to breed up their children, and to be instructed for the which there are many schooles, where they reade their lawes to the end they may ferue in their Mosques, and be able to gouerne the common weale.

The Turks by Mahomets law have leave to marry as many wives as they can maintaine: and a Turkish woman being once with childe, her husband neuer roucheth her vittill the be deliuered, but lies with his flaues out of the house where his wife remaines. They have a certaine kind of marriage made at pleafure, which they call Kebin the which is many times practifed by strangers, who being out of their country contract with women, whom they are to enjoy during their pleasure, and when they cast them off, they give them a certaine summe the which doe rather ruine than inrich a country : fecondly, they confume formany men in G their enterprises, as they scarce leane sufficient to manure their land, so as the subjects (despai ring to enjoy their wealth and necessary commodities, which they might get by their labour and industy) imploy not themselves to worke nor trafficke, no more than necessity shall confiraine them: for to what purpose is it, say they, to sow that another man must reape for to reape that which another will consume? And for this reason you shall see in the Turks estate whole countries lie wast, and many times great dearth, which growes by the want of men to manure their land; for that the country men for the most part either die in the voyages which they make, or in carrying victuals and other necessary things for their armies; for of 10000 which they draw from their houses to row in their gallies, scarce the fourth part returnes to their houses, by reason of the great toyles they endure. Another reason why the Sultans reue. H nues be no greater, is, for that when he conquers any country, he affignes the lands to his Timarri, who are bound to maintaine so many men, and so many horses, according to the proportion of land which he gives them, referring no sent.

But although his ordinary reuenues be no greater than we have spoken, yet he drawes great profit by his extraordinaries, especially by confiscations and presents; for being all his slaves, no man enjoyeth any thing longer than it pleaseth him : yea, the Bassand greatest officers of that crowne, which oppresse his subjects, and gather together inestimable wealth, in the end for the most part, it comes into the Turks Casna or Treasury. It is not strange there to fend for any subjects head, vpon any suggestion what soeuer; which no man date contradict: after which execution, his flaues and goods are fold in the market at Constantinople, and the mony applied to the Princes coffers. His presents also amount to great summes, for no Embaffador may come before him without a present, neither may any man expect any office or dignity without mony ano governor being returned from his province, dares present himselfe to the Sultan empty handed, neither are their presents of small price. The Sultans exchequer is gouerned by two Treasurers called Deftardari, who are more rightly gouernors of the reuenues, for that they keep an account of the Princes Cafna or Treasure, the one hath charge of the reuenues which are raifed in Natolia, and the other in Europe. Also they draw great profits from their tributary prominces, especially from Valachia, Moldaula, and Transylvamia, where the Princes maintaine themselues by presents and gifts; so as they change dayly, for that they that offer most are advanced, wherby they are forced to ruine the country, to per- K forme what they have promised.

But having spoken of the Turks forces and revenues, whereby they maintaine their armies to inuade their neighbours, we must now speake something of their lawer wherby the subjects are gouerned, which are institutions and answers of wise men, the which they hold as an interpretation of their Alcaron, which is the ground of their law. These institutions are conteined in twelve volumes, treating of all things belonging to civill conversation. Some provinces of Turkic are gouerned by customes, and enjoy their priviledges, and their wife ludges supply many things which are not written. The Sultan makes choice of the wifest and worthiest person that can be found of a sincere life according to their law, & he is called Musti, that is, Interpreter of their Alearon; he is (as it were), their high priest, attending only matters of te- L ligion and faith he is head of the church among the Turks, and decideth all questions of their law. He is of such eminency, as all the Bassace subject to his direction : he abaseth not himselfe so much as to sit in the Diuano, onely passeth through it when he is sent forby the Sultan, who (so soone as he seeth him) riseth from his seat as it were to honour him, and then they both fit downe face to face, and so confer together.

They make triall of the sufficientest of their Judges, before they chuse any, for which there are two Cadilesquiri Talismani, that is, Doctors of the law, and Examiners at Constantinople, or where some remaines. These examine the Judges or Cadi's of divers provinces. The one hath his charge over Europe, and is called Cadilesquirie Romly, before whom (atter good information of his life, and sufficiencie) he sweares that he will do justice to all men, M and yeeld an account of his charge when he shall be called. The othe Cadilesquirie is for Natolia: they are sourreigne judges in all causes, and as it were Patriarks. They are of great authority, and have place in the Divano with the Baffaes to confult of weighty matters, of mony, and keepe the children. The Cadi's or Judges allow not this kinde of contract, cf. pecially among it Christians, vnlesse it be with an oath of marriage. A Turke having had the vse of a Christian woman, they are both condemned to die, vnlesse she will adjure her faith: the like is observed betwixt a Christian and a Turkish woman, if they have been found toge. ther. Divorce is allowed among them in case of barrennesse and incontinency.

There are foure orders of religious-men among the Turks which differ in their living, habit, and ceremonies. These be the Terlaques, Dernie, Kalenders, and Huquiewales, and these last are very vicious, and wicked imposters, deceiving of the common people. The Dervis is a strict order living in contemplation, much like vnto the Capuchins among the Romish Papists. The Turks forbeare to blaspheme either God, Christ, or Makenes, or any other Saint what soever, and they punish blasphemy severely. They converse with Christians, and eat and trassique with them freely; yea, somtimes they marry their daughters, and suffer them to live after their owne religion. But they hate the Iewes, and despite them as the basest people in the World. They have an affured considence, that he that shall duely observe the lawes of Mahomes, shall have eternall life, and a Paradise full of delights: and contrariwise they that shall breake the lawes of their Alcaron are threatned with hell and eternall death; yet they have an opinion that hee that believes in the Alcaron when hee dies, shall be vidoubtedly saued.

The diffosition of the Turks.

To conclude this relation with some sew lines of their humors and dispotions; they write of them, that they are grosse witted, idle and vnsit for labour. They are exceeding couctous and corrupt, about all other Nations; for justice is sold to him that offers most. They are humble among themselves, and obey their superiours with great silence. They are proud and insupportable to strangers, thinking none sit to be compared with them. They are given to gluttony and drunkenpesse, and will spend whole daies together in feasing, and will drinke with excesse in private, for that it is forbidden by their law. They are vain glorious, proud and deceitfull, never keeping their words, but when it may be to their profit. They are much inclined to venery, and are for the most part all Sodomites. They are very supersitious, giving credit to dreames and divinations; and they hold that every mans destiny is written in his forehead, which cannot be altered or avoided.

Thus I have continued this History for eleven yeares, having informed my felfe out of the best authors and intelligencers I could fide that concerne this subject: I should have been glad that some which have resided at Constantinople most part of this time, would have affished mee with their observations, which should have beene for the generall good of our Nation, but I hope notwithflanding the Reader shall finde contens and satisfaction. STATE OF THE PARTY OF THE PARTY

A CONTINVATION OF THE TVRKISH HISTORY, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE YEARE OF OVR LORD 1620, VNTILL THE ENDING OF THE YEARE OF OVR LORD 1628.

COLLECTED OVT OF THE PAPERS and Dispatches of S'THOMAS ROWE, Knight, his Maiesties Embassador with the grand Signior during that time.

And since by Him re-viewed and corrected.

Efore we come to speak of the great pre- 1620, parations made by the grand Signior in the yeare 1621, to invade the kingdom of Poland, and those by that king to resist him: I hold it necessarie, briefly to set down the causes and reasons of the insuing war.

The Chrim Tartar, confining vpon the dukedome of Russia and borders of Poland, had made many incursions, and did great spoile vpon the Cossacks within that prouince of Russia, and other parts belonging to the Kingdom of Poland, and carrying away the people of all ages and sexes, made sale of them within the Turkes empire. Now Ican beagh Ghiray-Han Prince of the Tartars, being wholly dependent on the Ottoman Emp rors, his Maiesty of Poland sont many several Embassadors to complain at that Port; That notwithstanding the antient league betweene him and the Ottoman Family, the Tartars greatly spoiled his Countries, which was both vniust and against the treaties. How socuer the complaints were many and great, yet the king of Polands ministers sound no redresse for those their alledged wrongs; but were answered, That the Tartars were absolute lords ouer themselves, and that they pretended to have an annual tribute of 4000 Dollars from the king of Poland; which being denied them, they had reason so to do: and that the grand Seignior could only intreat, but not command them to successe. The Tartars seeing the Polacke thus sleighted at the Port, grew more insolent and outragious wherewith the Turkes were well content, for the great benefit they received by flaves which were continually brought to be fould in their do. G minions, finding for the most part that those men had able bodies, and fit to be applied to the oare. It is true that the Chrim Tartars in antient time beeing so neere neighbours, were woont to receive such a Pension from the Crowne of Poland, for the which they were obliged to seaue in euery occasion of Warre: but of later yeares that payment hathdiscontinued; because they rather received hurt, than any assistance from that vagabond and predato. ry people.

When the Cossacks saw that after so many complaints they could not live at rest, not procure restitution of their wrongs, nor take their reuengevpon the Tartars, being a slitting and fugitiue nation, who had no certain place of abode; they refolued to fall into the dominions of the grand Signior, who feemed, if not to protect, yet to confide at injuries they received H from these their neighbors. The Cossacks then that inhabited vpon the banks of the river Bo. rishenes (which emptieth it selfe into the blacke sea) were coniectured to bee fittest forthe execution of this reuenge : and therfore they prepared a number of wel armed Barques, & fal. ling down the river, did very great dammage, by robbing, spoiling, and burning divers townes and villages bordering upon the black fea.

This news being brought to Constantinople, the grand Signior took it in great scorne, that fuch a base and rude people should come and asront him so neer his doores. Therfore he caufed some gallies to be armed forth with speed to suppresse them : but his forces were source or fine times valiantly repulsed, and stil the Cossack went safely home with his prey. Now the tide of affairs was turned, and this great Emperor who was formerly petitioned by the Polack. I is now become a fuitor to him, & finds his Ministers measured by the answer the grand Signior had given concerning the wrongs don by the Tartars: That though the Coffacks adhere to the Crown of Poland, yet are they a free people of themselves : but when the Tartar shall cease from his hostilitie, it is like enough the Pole will intreat the Cossacke to do the same: and that is all the authoritie he can exercise ouer them.

Affairs standing thus, no accommodation for wrongs on either side could be made; and niors preparation the grand Signior, although he was now but fifteen years of age, yet was hee strong, vigorous, with the King and of a high spirit, and more than desirous of a war, but especially with the King of Poland, from whom he looked for better fatisfaction. This defire was nourished in him by the counfels of Ali Bassa great Vizier; and notwithstanding it was veterly disliked by at the rest of the K Ministers of state, and officers of war in that Empire, a war was neuerthelesse thereupon proclaimed throughout all the Turks Dominions; which did in generall displease the common foldier alfo.

of Loland.

The grand Signior the foure and twentieth of Aprill commanded paiment to be made to all the Soldierie; and the day following caused all his tents and pauilions, with those of his Viziers and other officers, to be solemnly pitched without the City, with all trades that were to attend his Royal camp. Who having now gathered of foot and horse three hundred thoufand (though reported to be twice the number) fet forward together with his court and train out of Constantinople the 29 of April, with three hundred field pieces, beside a hundred cannon fent vnto the frontiers by fea; leaving Achmat Baffa and the Bostangi Bassa gouernors of L

the ciry til his return.

When he was arrived at the confines of Poland he first attempted the fortresse of Chotyn in the province of Moldavia, lately given by Gasparo Gratiani to the Polacks. The which being strong of scituation, and well furnished for defence, the Turke finding it difficult to carry in tew daies, left it besieged; and passing the river of Boristhene, found there the Chancellor of Poland intrencht upon the borders, in a strong place and of good advantage, with forty thousand Polacks and Cossacks, and eight thousand high Dutch, sent by the Emperor in aid of the King of Poland. The Prince was incamped at Caminitza, and strongly intrenched with fixty thousand souldiers; the King abiding in Cracovia, with the Nobilitie and his Court. The grand Signior facing the Trenches vpon Boristhene, with the multitude of his M army inclosed them round, and shut up all the passages; sending presently the prince of the Tartars, Iean. beagh-Ghiray-Han, with thirty thousand light horse to make incursions within the heart of Poland: who did great spoile, and brought away captines twenty fine shouland foules of all forts; which dammage did not fo much proceed from the will of the Prince, as

A from a Captaine of his, a Nobleman of Tattarie called Kante-Emir-Bmirze, in great fauor at that time with the Emperour: for it was thought that betweene the King of Poland, and the Prince of Tartarie, there was some secret intelligence by the vertue of money.

During the space of foure and thirty dayes that the Grand Seignior held these Trenches belieged, almost every other day he gave them terrible assaults, but was alway forced to retyre with loffe. The Polacke in brauerie making some fallies, were also glad to recouer their strength; onely once they so farre advanced in the evening with their shot upon the quarter of the Ianizaries, that they made a great execution, and almost pur the whole camp into diforder; and as the Turks themselves did confesse, if this fally had been given in the night, it had hazarded the confusion of the whole army: All which being feen by the Grand Signior, R and little hope of advancing further, for divers reasons he was inforced to treat a coffation of Armes with the Chancellor. The first was, That he had spent so much time without any aduantage, and the Winter approched, whereby his army fuffered great extremities of cold and other miferies, by reason of terrible raines which had carried away diners tents, horses, and other cattell, and some part of his cannons. Secondly, the prouision of sodder was become so deare, that divers for fooke their horses for want of means to feed them; besides the great mortalitie of men, of fluxes, Feuers, & colds, and the horses of Asia not vied to such a climat, that many men of quality that came out with ten & 12, were compelled to return on foot. Thirdly, the army either for wearinesse, or for discontent received from the Emperour himselfe, for his narrownesse and anarice shewed to the soldier, contrary to the glorious example of his an-C ceftors in like enterprises not only refused to fight, but were little lesse than mutined. Fourthly, this attempt from the beginning proceeding meerely from the obstinacie of the Grand Signior, contrary to the counfell of most of his Visiers, who desired generally a peace: at their folicitation and by the mediation of Radula Prince of Valachia, both parts were easily induced to treaty, and the Chancellor was drawn to fend a Secretarie to the Grand Signior; where it was agreed, as followeth. First. That the Emperor Sould raise his army, and retyre from the confines of Poland and the Tartars as the occasioners of this war should fend an EmirZe to reside as a pledge from ensuing incursions. The Chancellor promising in the name of the King of Poland, to keep another in the court of the Pil ce of Tartarie with condition to pay yearely as aforefaid forty thousand florins (an antient presention of the 7 ar-D tars) as a donative from the King of Poland, promising moreover, for the better consirmation of the future peace to maintain a Relident in the Port of the Ottoman Court and wonthe arrivall of enery fuch Embaffador, to fend a Present conformable to the Ledgiers of other Christian Princes. And as the Grand Signior was obliged for the Tartars that they should forbeare all innasions upon the Polacke : so the Polacks should bind themselves in behalfe of the Coffacks, that they should comme no roberses in the dominion of the Grand Signior. And further covenanting in the name of the Polish Merchants for the Priwiledge of free traffike, to make a Present of an hundred thousand chequines in plate, Sables, and Bulgary hides, alway intended with this references in that this treaty (hould not prejudice or bind with the Grand Signior did fenda Chianstothe King of Poland with thefe overtures, that he might have time to affemble his Parliament, and there to resolve to send an Embassador with ample authoritie to treat and conclude E a finall peace in the Port. Whereupon the Grand Signior being facisfied with these conditions. did dispatch presently his Nuntio into Poland, and suddenly to the great content of all his army, he raised his camp, and returned to Adrianople.

By relation of divers prefent in that war, it was reported, That there died in the Turkes The laft in the camp, by the fword, famin, ficknesse and cold, about eighty thousand men, and about an hundred thousand horse; and the remaine at their returne, appearing so naked, sick ly, and poore. made euident demonstration of the great losse and miserie sustained. The Polacks in their trenches loft aboue twenty thousand by the famine suffered in their besieging : so that if the winter and other wants had not constrained the grand Signior to rise with some pretence of honor, and that he had staid a few daies longer, they had bin forced to render or perith: which is cuident, for that they were glad and prompt to accept of any agreement, although as yet there was nothing fully concluded.

The grand Signior being informed that the Emperour of Germany had sent aid of eight thousand Dutch to the King of Poland, and inraged that hee had so little advanced in that attempt, pretending that the Emperour by giuing succors had broken the peace; to vent his G choler, contrary to the aduice of his Councell, presently upon his arising from the confines The grand Sig. choter, contrary to the addition in the confines wire invaged at of Poland, in his camp proclaimed war against Germany for the next Spring; commanding vpon great penaltie, all his fouldiers and flaues to be ready for that inuation. Which gave great discontent to the army, infomuch as they did almost publiquely professe, that they neither could nor would follow him. And conformable to this his rafh resolution, hee gaucorder to Kante-Emir-Emirze, a Tartarian captain then Baffa of Siliftra, to winter with 20000 of his soldiers in the frontier. Presently hereupon Cafar Gallo the Emperours Embassadour was Rayed at Buda; the Grand Signior pretending, that hee had promifed vpon his life, that the Emperor would give no sid to the King of Poland. Not confidering that he himself contrary to the peace, the summer before had surprised Vatz a town of Hungary, and had permitted H many of his fouldiers to follow the prince of Transylvania, as Voluntiers against the Em. peror.

The King of Poland hearing of this resolution against the Emperour, called the Chiaux fent about the Treaty, before him, and told him, That if the grand Signior should proceed to make war voon the Emperour for his occasion, that he could conclude no peace with him. being obliged to take part with the Emperor as his deare brother and Confederate. Which message the Chiaus sent to the grand Signior when hee was yet at Adrianople, where hee either purposed to Winter to affright the Emperour, or to quicken the Polacke to a conclusion of peace; cold in his sudden pretence, by the persuasions of the Visiers and Musti hee changed his refolution, and tooke his way to Constantinople, where hee arrived the last of December.

Now it being given out, That the Emir of Syria or Sidon was in rebellion, and that hee had possessed himself of the city and castle of Tripolie, the grand Signior pretended to goin person against him, and gaue out 60000 Checquines to prepare his carriages and paullions; and tooke order to provide his palace in Aleppo, determining to passe that way, to amuse and raise suspition in the Persian and likewise commanded the army of Asia to be in readines by the end of the month of April; and gaue out commission for victuals, munition, and other neceffaries. The Mufti, Hoja, and other the Visiers who knew not the mistery, misliking this counsel, with great instances and reasons dissuaded him, as being a course very dangerous to his estate. First, that his Maiesty should go in person, leaving all Greece desolate, and commit the care and gouernment of his Imperial feat to a poor Chimacham or lieutenant, it not being probable, that the Emir of Sidon would stay to oppose himself against the force of his royal army, but rather make an escape, and retyre himself to some part of Christendom : and that a Generall by land, and the Captain Bassa Admirall of the sea, with his sleet of Gallies, would fusfice to punish and destroy him. Besides, if his Maiestie vndertooke the journey in person, it was necessary that all his soldiers should attend him, which were a charge superfluous and aboue the enterprise, and almost impossible for them, having bin so harrassed and difressed in the late invasion of Poland, who did even publiquely murmure that they would not go. For which reasons the King seemed to change his resolution, and was contented to make a General by land, with the army of Afia: to which charge was named the Baffa of Cai- I 10. The next day after, the grand Signior comming to the Arfenal, he called the Visier Basfa, the Admiral, and the great Treasurer before him; where it was concluded, to make ready at least an hundred gallies: for the preparation wherof fixty thousand Checquines were then deliuered; the Visier promising to furnish the rest of the whole charge with expedition, of his own purse, and to take it vp vpon the Kings Assignations. Wherupon the grand Signior with great content did vest them as a mark of fauor, and gaue present commission to the Admiral to be ready and to depart by the midst of Aprill following and for his better strength he gaue a command to fend for aids to Tunes and Algier. Which was thought requifice, because it was reported that the prince Philibers of Savoy, then Viceroy of Sicilie, had invesdinesse fixty Gallies and six Gallions at Messina; which force was doubted would be imploied M to give fuccor to the Emir of Sidon, or to revenge the attempt and late facke of Manfredonia. So that they were with all expedition rigging and preparing the Armado in the Arlemall: and for prouision and preuention of the work, there was ordained twelue small Gallies

A and the ordinary fleet of frigots to keep the black fea from the incursion of the Cossacks and 1621. though it was given out that this army was only prepared against the Emir, yet many that vnderstood the secrets of that empire, knowing it to be too great, did believe it should bee sent to prevent a generall revolt, which was then murmured and suspected in Asia.

About this time, contrary to the counsel and wil of all his ministers, the grand Signior maried the grand child of a Sultana wife to Pertan Baffa, only for her beauty, without any pomper Thegrand Sign which was ill interpreted in that court; his ancestors of late yeares not vsually taking wines, wier maried, especially of a Turkish race, in respect of kindred. This and other inconstancies, with extream auarice, made him odious to the fouldier; and his daily haunting the Arcets on foot, fomtimes disguised with a page or two, prying into houses and tauernes like a petty Officer,

B increased his contempt even in the city.

Secret order was given about the same time to Dias. Mahomet Bassa of Canissa, and to Gelut. Emirzea Tartarian, to unite themselues with Bethlem Gabor against the Emperout of Germanic. But the Baffa of Buda did advertise the graund Signior, That Gaber had concluded peace with the Emperour; which news did greatly displease him, beeing ardent in the desire of war.

The peace between the grand Signior and the king of Poland was not yet fully concluded. The King of but Embassadors weekly expected at the Port from Poland and other places, to hasten a full Embassadors. confummation therof. Among which, S' Thomas Rowe Knight, Embassador in ordinary from vinets as the his Majesty of great Brittain to the grand Signior, arrived there the first of Ianuary, and had Pork C his audience speedily, when he made this speech vnto him in English:

MOst high and mighty Emperor, his facred Maicstic the King of great Brittaine, France, and Ire-land, my most gratious Lord and Soveraign, according to the antient league of friendship and amitie, of long time begun and continued between the most noble Ancestors of your Maiesties, and in his royall person confirmed by his fundry Embassadors and Letters, both to your renowned father, and to your Imperial Maiesty: being fully determined on his part, to maintain and inviolably to hold a fair and good peace and correspondence with your Maielly ; bath commanded and sent mee with hu Letters of credence and friendly present, to reside as his Embassador in your royall Court. Not doubting but your Imperial Maiefly will accept them, and receive me his unworthy fernant with your wonted honor and favour : and that you will give credit unto me in divers maiters of importance which hee hath commanded me to deliuer in his mame : comprehended in five articles written in this Memoriall : And that you would be pleased to do ther in according to the royall friendship of his Masely and your princely wisedom and justice. The particulars wherof I defire your Maiesty to reade and consider at your case and leisure, and to affoord mee your royall answer; his Masefty resting affured he soul reseive content and satisfaction worthy his Royall friendsbip.

The Letter of Credence sent by S' Thomas Rome.

Ames by the grace of God, King of great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Christian Faith, against all those that fally professe the name of Iclus, &c. To the most high and mighty Prince Sultan Olman Han, chiefe Lord and Commander of the Ottoman kingdom and Empire of the East, sendeth health and greeting.

E doubt not but you received our Letters fent by our fubiets Iohn Chapman; whereby we fig-fignified unto you our royall pleasure, to resalt and discharge our Embassador Sir Iohn Ayre from his imployment and residence in your Court; whom wee desired you in your princely savor to desire se for our especiall service, and to receive the bearer of our faid Letters as Agent, to remaine in your prose-F Etion, for the better support and maintenance of our subjects which do trade and abide in your dominions, and for the advancement and continuance of the mutuall commerce and friendship which hath bin a long time contrasted between your predecessors and ours, untill the arrival of Sir Thomas Rowe, of whom at then we made choice to fend unto your Port at our Embaffadour and well to propound unto you divers things necessary for the generall peace, was to reside in your court for our particular service. Notwithfan - G ding lest the said letters should not come safely to your royall hands, wee have thought fit again to make known our purpose of recalling our former Embassador Sir Iohn Ayie, and to desire you to discharge and dismission from your Port, and to receive and admit in his roome our trusty and welbeloued Servant Sir Thomas Rowe, one of the principal Gentlemen of our Court, and of our Pring Chamber; whomwee haue expressly sent, and whom we authorise under our great Seal of England, as our Embassador to reside at your Port, and to negotiate in our name, and in the behalfe of our subsects abiding within your King. domes. Of whose fidelisse and discretion as we are well affured so we doubt not but he will give you good content in his demeanor and negotiation with you. Wee have also thought fit to put you in minde of those common Rouers upon the seas, who are enemies to the Lawes of Nations, and spoilers of the quiet & peace. able Merchant, by whom amitie and friendsh p is maintained betweene Kings and Princes: That you H would please to exercise your great and mighty power to chastise and destroy them, as Traitors to your honour, and infringers of the facred and publique peace. In full affurance that you will extend the same good respect vato vs, as your royall Ancestours have don unto our most renowned predecessours, whereby that antient Leagus and commerce may be inviolably maintained between both our Kingdomes, which on our part we shall be very loth to infringe or d Solue We doe by these our Letters recommend unto jour princely fauour this our faid trufty servant and Embassadour, to reside and remaine in your Port, on our behalfe to treat with you in all aff aires for the publique weale of our Dominions, and for the general peace of vs both, and our Allyes and friends, as also for the support and aid of all our subjects which doe line and trade within your Estates and Countries : To whose good discretion we commend their affaires, and by whose industry and mediation we conceive our people may bee relieved in their inft and reasonable demands, to the perfect maintenance and affurance of that mutuall crimmerce which hath folong time been continued betweene our royall progenitors. And as we have great cause to professe our grateful acknowledgement for many favors which our former Embassadors and all other our subjects have and doe receive from your Royall hands, so in our princely lone we do intreat you to take knowledge of, and to commandre. dreffe for divers oppressions and wrongs done winto some of our said subjects persons and goods that live under the affurance of your friendfhip with us which we have formerly fignified to our Refidents at your Port but as we verely believe they have never come unto your cares, which are open to the just complaints of all strangers : wherof we have now given charge to our servant and Embassadour to acquaint you with more at large. I nto whom we defire you to give protection and credit in what source he shall move or propound, for the establishing confirmation, and inlargement in all occasions, of those liberties and primitedges which our subjects have antiently enjoyed, by the benignitie of your self and of your royall Aucestors; and in all other things and occasions, wherin he hath or shall receive our commands, as if our self did communicate them with you, which wee doubt not shall redound unto the great utilisic and honor of both our Empires. And so we wish you health and true felicitie.

Dated at our royall city of London the fixth day of September, Anno Dom. 1621, and of our reign of great Brittain, France, and Ireland, the nineteenth.

Articles propounded by the Embassador to the grand Signior.

First, his sacred Maiestic of great Brittaine, according to the most noble and renowned League of Amitie betweene your Maiesties, and your Crownes and Dominions, hath commaunded meetorenew the antient Capitulations and Priviledges granted by your Imperial Maiestie and your royall Anceftours, and therein to moone your Maiestie, That you will be pleased to inlarge and extend your fanour unto our Nation that line under your protection, and to give remedie to divers injuries done unto them by the Cuft mers of this royall Port, Aleppo, Smyrna, Scio, Patras, and other places, contrary to the juflice and onenr of your Maiestie : And to give order for severall commaunds in these places, mall our inst occasions, that both the fame of your justice may bee renowned, and the friendship of your Ma. M sefters confirmed, and the correspondence and commerce betweene your Dominions established and increased.

Secondry, His Maiestie bath commanued me to offer himselfe as a Mediatour of peace; to me

A commodate the late breach with the king dom of Poland : the King of Poland having fent his Embassador expresse into England to desire his aid, he bath thought it more agreeable to bu honor, and to the antient league of friendlisp, to wfe his credit with your Athieftic, to procure the generall quiet and peace of the princes of Christendom : desiring your Maielly to consider his interest in the publique cause, and not to despife the forces of somany as may partake in the quarrell : which if your Maiesty shal hearken wnto the rather for his cake as your royall Ancestor hath done in the like occasion, his Maiesty will accept it as a respect of your love, which will assure and increase the commerce and friendship of your Dominions in which his Maieltic hath given me more particular and full Instructions to treat and mediate in this bu-

Thirdly his Maiestic hath commanded me to move your Imperial Maiesty for the release of divers of R the Polish Nobilitie, now your captines; and for one Scottish gentleman, a subject of his Muchy my royall Malter.

Fourthly, his Maiestie desires that you will take some order with the pyrats of Tunes and Algiers who shelter themselves under your royall protection (to the great dishonour of your Maielie) and doe many robberies upon the subjects of Kings and princes in amitie and league with your Empire, and take cuen the hips fent unto your royall Port. Admonthing your Maieflie to confider, that if they be fuffered to continue, they will occasion the dissolution of all commerce and trade; being common enemies to all honest Merchants, by whom the friendship of these king doms are maintained and increased. And that if your Imperiall Maiestie please not to exercise your Royall power and authoritie to bridle or destroy them that then you will not take it in ill part, that his Maiestie with other Princes his Allyes, shall make an army to punish both him and all others that receive and cherish them which hath butherto bin forborne one's in respect of your Maiestie; and that the towns where they harbor themselves are or ought to bee under your Imperiallcommand.

Fiftly, his Maiestic hath commanded me to require justice and restitution of a great sum of money taken from Arthur Garaway, here imprisoned by force and injurie in the time of Achmet Baffa : wherof his Maiesties former Embassadors haue complained to Sultan Achmatyour Maiesties renowned father. and to Mehemet Baffa Vizier, to Huffen Baffa, to the Hoja of the King, and to the Mufti, wherin your Maiellies most noble father gave commaund for our satisfaction. All the said great Officers having heard the cause, upon examination giving their testimonies, of the great wrong don unto him: Mehemet Baffa also writing a letter, by the order of your Maiesties royall father, promiting justice and restitution D which his Maieflie doth yet expect, and again demand. And having fo often written in this cause, his Maiestie will not beleeve, but that in justice and honor this royall court would do right; imputing the fault to his own Ministers and Embassadors that they never complained to your Imperial Majesty, according to his Highnesse command. Also his Maiestie hath commanded mee to require and desire your Maieftie to give me your Royall answer in all thefe particulars by your letters in writing as shall be sit for your own bonor, and conformable to the antient league of amitte and friendship between your Royall As ..

His Maiesties Embassador not many daies after sent to the Vizier, who had promited him an answer vnto these articles: Who returned him this that followeth.

To the first he said, That the Emperor his Master had given him order to renew the Capie Thegrand Sign tulations, and to make any fuch additions as should be requisit, agreeable to their law, & con- more answer. formable to their antient league, and that therin the Embassador should finde no difficultie: for they honored his Maiestie, and were resolved to give him assurance of their will to main. tain a true friend ship; and therfore defired the Embassador to draw and prepare the Capitulations, and fend them to him and the Chancellor, who would confider them, and being fuch as were fit to be granted he should have speedy order.

To the second the Vizier answered with great subtilty; First, instifying the occasion of the war, and imputing the fault to the Cossackes, maintained by the Pole to rob euen at the port of Conftantinople: therfore that the Emperor could not in honor but chaften and deftroy F them, having first by message demanded justice against them; and now his Master beeing ingaged with great charge, and in his honor, he could make no peace with them who had beguiled him: pretending that they had no other intention but the war, because having raised his Camp, and diffolued his Army, the Polacks now found him, and kept no faith, neither fending Embassadour nor messenger, no not any letter since their returne. That therefore they could not hearken to any condition: and that his Maiestie of great Brittain did not value the

To the third he replied, That the motion for the prisoners was vnscaseable because in order it should follow the general treaty and making peace, which if finished, his Maiesticof great Brittain should finde, that for his sake all those mentioned in the Memorial should be free, except only the prince Coresky, who had bin the cause of many troubles, and had madee-

To the fourth he made protestation in the grand Signiors name against the pirats, offring that his Maiesties Embassador should have what commands, what message he would desire,

To the fifth hee replied, That it was an old obsolete quarrell, and that the Embassador did H him injurie to presse him, when in the time of three former Viziers his predecessors could obtaine no reliefe. Therefore he would not looke backe vpon the actions of other men, nor rake among the bones of the dead; but he defired the Embassador should rest satisfied, That while he had the honor to gouerne, there should no wrong be done vnto the English Nation, and that he would heare all complaints, so as no man should need to looke backe vpon his

This perfunctory answer did not much satisfie his Maiesties Embassador, but that hee defired some other of effect, being both to accept of generalities; and therfore required a direct reply for his own discharge. Which was promised after much pressing, by the Visier who had first vindertaken the same.

The long stay of the Duke of Sharaskie (chosen extraordinarie Embassadour by the King of Poland, to consummate the peace between him and the grand Signior) did much trouble the Emperors court, and especially the Visier, who procured a cessation of arms, but that a letter was writ by the King of Poland, which did a little prolong their hopes. In the mean time the Emperor divulged a pretence to visit Mecha, the tombe of Mahomet his great Prophet; contrary to the counsell and instance of all his Visiers that knew not the secret, and even to the hafard of a generall repolt; for they were jealous, that under colour of that voyage he had fome other defigne; and it was feared, the duke would not proceed to follow him at random. nor treat with his Deputies left at the Port. For the Polacks seemed in performing and asfuring the peace, a little too glorious of their good successe; and the Nobilitie not so obedi- K ent to the King as that he could absolutely command. Which did both trouble their agents at the Port, and discontent the Turkes: so that a little motion of the Cossackes or Tattars at that time (spoil being both their lively hoods) had kindled new fires, and had disturbed or quite broken off the treaty.

In the mean space the grand Signior writhis letter to his Maiesty of great Brittaine, in answer to his royal letter by his Embassador; wherin was contained a satisfactorie reply to all the particulars of those fine articles delinered to him: & the grand Signior had such demonstration of great care to give his Maiesty all content and satisfaction, that his letter was presented to his Embassador with ceremonies of honor, requiring that it should bee sent by an expresse messenger, and gaue command for a safe conduct for that purpose. The true translated copy wherof doth immediatly follow.

some other inserted. And whereas certaine Customers and other officers of our Empire, have often transgreffed our Royall agreements, and done many violences and injuries to the Merchants your subjects, that for the time to come they may be secured from all oppression: and concerning the affaires of the Polacks, that the enmity and war lightly begun betweene vs and them, might be converted into pea e and friendship; and that there should be established a sincercleague and amity, as in the time of our Anceflors. And shat diners Noblemen of Poland, and one of your Majesties Subjects now detained in our captinity, should be set at liberty. Complaining also against the Inhabitants of I unes and Algier, That they who have violated our Imperial Capitulations, Amity, and League, ought to be duely punfied. And lastly, That whereas one of your subjects named Arthur Garraway, from whom wpon a pretension there was a great fine taken, and other wrong done wnto his person, you desire that his cause may be with justice B renewed: All which being made knowne wnto vs, with prudent and mature deliberation we have both ducly weighed and perfectly conceived them. Wherefore by the funour of the great and profeerous God we do promife, that in all these matters propounded, we will apply our Imperiall care and deligence: And we have already given our high and expresse command, that our antient Capitulations shall be renewed and confirmed. And such conditions as are correspondent to the peace, amily, and league betweene vs. Shall in due time be granted. And there Shall be fent with all expedition, our Royall Edicts to all our (a) Beg lerbees, (b) Beghs (c) Cadees Gouernors, Cuftomers, Farmors, Superintendents and Commissio. (4) Vierryu. ners of our Revenues, that from henceforth none of them Shall give any moleflation to any of your Mer- (b) erefiduette chants or other Subjects. And infomuch as our happy gates are ener open to any who with fineerity fecke our friendship, goodwill, and fanour; and the table of our linely Graces is alwaies prepared for all men:

C Therefore when some on the behalfe of the Polacks, an Embaffadour (ball arrive at our high Court, and kiffe the hemme of our vesture, and repent of their former errors, and present unto us a good friendship and sincere league, and shall desire our favour and amity by the mediation of your Resident now in our Imperiall Port, all matters shall be pacified and ended, and with a pen we will blot out all former deferences. And the peace being fo effabl fied your instances and defires for them shall have gratefull acceptance with vs, and we will give fit order for the prisoners.

To the Beglerbeghs of Tunes and Algiers, and to all other our slaves in those parts, we will presently fend our expresse and bigh commands and other orders, that they shall never hereafter trasgresse the tenor of our Imperial Capitulations, nor commit any injustice, nor do any violence to the Subjects of your Majesty. And concerning the busin see of the Merchant Atthur Garraway, wherein you have informed us, n that there hath beenetaken from him by oppr. is on a great estate and faculty, in the time of our father Achmat Han of happy memory (the Vizier Achmat Baffa being then Deputy here) upon presence that divers Muffulmens goods were found in his hands : which cause being now onerpassed many yeares, you require a new hearing and inquisition. By the grace of the great God it hall be remewed and examined with all Iustice : in the processe and issue whereof you shall be assured to receive a right and fit anfwer from your Embaffader now remaining in our Court. And in our time we shall never permit, that any the least injury or injustice shall be done to any. Graing you assurance on our behalfe, that the soundation and nerves of peace, friendsh p and league betweene vs, are of vs streightly preserved, continued. and encreased: and your amity, correspondency, and love, is ever respected, esteemed, and pretious with vs. Therefore in the meane time, while our capitulations are making perfect, and that the full conclusion may Be certified with you your Embaffadour having folicited ws for an answer to the propositions made by you; by an expresse Messenger, Robert Rowe, this our Imperiall letter is written and sent wnto you. Which arriving, we hope that as in times past, the antient, perfect, and acceptable course of friendship. amity, and league, adorned with aboundant fincerity, resplendant love, and benigne correspondency on your part, bath beene alway observed and maintained; so it is now also requisite, that you preserve the same affections, with all pure, firme, and constant good will, grace, and gooduesse or rather that you advance and encrease therein, as we shall cuer do by all sincere waies of loyall friend bip and ho'y peace, nonvishing it with our perfect intention and affectionate diligence, never admitting any occasion that may be thereunto prejudicial.

The Grand Signior defi-TONS of Deace with the lelacke.

The Grand Signior discontented since his disgrace in Poland, as soone as he ecameto G Constantinople, meditating reuenge vpon his souldiers, and finding that his pretence for Sidon did not relish, gaue out that he would passe into Asia to visit Mecha the tombe of his false Prophet; but having secret intelligence with Delawir Bassa, he prepared a select army of his followers to be ready in Asia, to execute his secret designe,

To make this voyage the more secure in apparance, hee seemed content to accept of any treaty with the Polacks, euen to conditions both of disaduantage and dishonour, for his e. flates in Hungary, he re-inforced the frontiers with divers troups; and though he were much troubled at the league betweene the Emperour of Germany and Bethlem Gabor, yet he diffembled it so, as that he would not displease the Transyluanian, but rather offered new succours, and forbearance of his tribute. From the incursions of the Cossackes he hoped to as. H fure himselfe by the treaty of the Poles; and in occasion of breach, he had the Tartars ready to requite them; and for more security, he added to the number of his gallies appointed to keepe the Blacke Sea. The common people and Visiers of the Portwhich loued rest, and knew not the defigne, were much troubled and discontent at this journy; and made many remonstances to him of the inconvenience and danger, to leave the feat of his Empire to the trust of a Deputy, in a time when Bethlem Gabor was newly reconciled to the Germane Emperour, and therefore not to be trufted; and the Polackes scarcely reconciled to him, and therefore to be missrusted. Divers other reasons were made to him, many petitions delive. red from the Church men, Lawyers, and from all Estates. But melancholy reuenge had wholly possessed him, so that by no meanes he could be persuaded to desist. The souldierie passed fo far as to threaten publiquely, and to protest they would not follow, but rather set vp another King in his absence, that should stay among them. In conclusion, carried by his owne fare to destruction, having first commanded away his Armado to the Levant, and thereby disposed many of his souldiers, spon Wednesday the seuenth of May, he began to passe ouer his tents and Pauilions to Asia side, with great quantities of treasure. The Ianizaries and Spahies, who had also secret intelligence vpon the King; his owne words and actions betraying some further project than a Pilgrimage (for he made preparations to carry away all his jewels and treasure cuen desacing his palace, and taking from Churches, and his Ward-robes what socuer could be converted to Bullion) suddenly met at the Hippodrome in the city, vpon a word given; and from thence ranne to the Seraglio in tumult, but without armes, and there according to their barbarous mutinies, cryed out for their King (having first taken order to stop the passage of any thing upon the water.) Who appearing to them, asked, What this infolency meant, and what they pretended ? They then, by the mouth of a multitude (for they had no head but that of the monster) demanded first, That he should not proceed in his purpose to go to Mecha, nor into Asia; but that he would abide in the city. Secondly, they required to have delivered to their fury, the great Visier Delauir Bassa, the Hoja or Consessor of the King, the Caslariaga, Gouernour of the women, the Destardar or Treasurer, the Caddeleschar or chiefe Iustice, and some others, as enemies to the State, and consenting to this voyage, which they pretended would be the ruine of the Empire. The first, after a little dispute, the King granted vnto them, promising to give over his journey; but they not content, exacted it in writing. To the second he replied, That it was dishonour to him to have his servants torne from him without order of Iustice: but persuaded them to have patience, to flay vntill Saturday, the next Diuan or publique Councell, where they should appeare, and if they were found culpable, they should receive punishment; not meaning to performe any of this, but to get time and allay their present surv. These fellowes not content with this moderate answer, undertooke to know that these officers were guilty, and therefore that they needed no other witnesse, tryall, nor judge, but themselves; and with extreame clamor called to have them rendered. But the King refusing to give them any other satisfaction, and they unprepared for force, returned into the city, which now was all in feare, every house and shop shutvp, expecting a generall sacke. But they followed the way of their owne hatred, and first M went into the house of the Hoja, which they brake and pillaged: But not finding him, they proceeded to the great Visiers, who made some defence, and they (being vnarmed) beat them off; and fo they separated, being now cuening, but yet kept a guard in some parts of the town. That night the King made an attempt to fend ouer to Afia fide, but was preuented; and to

A fortific and defend the Seraglio, which was strongly walled about, and had alway in it of houshold servants about three thousand : but it seemed no man would arme in his cause : for the The Language shold irruants about three thousand; but it seemed no man would arme in his cause: for the desired next morning the Mutiniers assembled againe, and taking their arms, went first to the Mutti, the Grand's processing the morning the Mutiniers assembled agains, and taking their arms, went first to the Mutti, the Grand's processing the morning the Mutiniers assembled agains, and taking their arms, went first to the Mutti, the Grand's processing the morning the Mutiniers assembled agains, and taking their arms, went first to the Mutiniers assembled agains, and taking their arms, went first to the Mutiniers assembled agains, and taking their arms, went first to the Mutiniers assembled agains, and taking their arms, went first to the Mutiniers assembled agains, and taking their arms, went first to the Mutiniers assembled agains, and taking their arms, went first to the Mutiniers assembled agains, and taking their arms, went first to the Mutiniers assembled agains, and taking their arms, went first to the Mutiniers assembled agains, and taking their arms, went first to the Mutiniers assembled agains, and taking their arms, went first to the Mutiniers assembled agains, and taking their arms, and taking the morning the m or Arch-priest among them, and inforced him and divers others to accompany them to the or. Court, where they anew demanded those officers, but with more instance and fury. In the meane time the Hoja, Cadaleschar, and Testerdar fled, and were not in long time discouered. The Vifier retired to the King, and perfuaded him carnelly to go ouer in perfon in his owne boats (which from his garden he might easily doe) to Asia, and there to take horse, and hee would secure him from all perill; but the King would not moue, bidding him stay, confident and affured that he would punish these Rebels.

The wise old man seeing this constancy or obstinacy, defired leave to shift for himselfe which he tooke or obtained, and fo got away to the hermitage of a Saint renowmed among it them; who (like himselse) betraied him, yet did him the fauour as not to deliuer him to the multitude, but persuaded and carried him backe to the Kings house. At this time it was disouted in the Seraglio about the deliuery of those officers, the Emperour refusing, the Rebels clamouring and threatening; infomuch as he began to feare they would breake in, and in their rage do worse than was yet pretended. Whereupon (whether by the Kings order, or by his owne consent, willing to be the peace offering) the braue Visier went out to them, and with a good affurednesse demanded what they fought of him, and wherein he had offended. At first The great Vigood anurednessed emanded what they longittor him, and wherethe had offended. From by they were amaled; but one infolent villaine breaking the generall modelty, they answered for finite by the language.

The Emperour feeing their fury so outragious, had now more cause to doubt, and retired himselse, then too late, when he had lost his faithfull Counsellor; and would have sled into Asia, but could not, yet he conveyed himselfe into a private place prepared by his Bostangi Baffa, or chiefe Gardener. The Rebels continued without in their madnesse, asking for the King, and for more facrifices. But the feruants protesting they knew not where he was, they faid they must have a King, and if he would not appeare, they would make another: and hauing a while attended, they refolued to enter the Palace (but first tooke a generall oath not to facke the Imperiall Throne, which they called their House and their Honour) and there seeking for the King, not able to finde him, they extorted by confession the Casteriaga, and slew D him; and then they demanded for Mustapha, vncle to Osman, by him formerly deposed, a man The Junice. efteemed rather holy (that is, franticke) than wife, and indeed fitter for a Cell than a Scepter. 100 The King the first day of this tumult had put Mustapha into a vault with two Negro women, without bread or drinkes in which estate these new electors found him, almost naked and halse pined. At first sight he thought they had beene the messengers of death; but that seare pas-may drinke gold, or the bloud of innocents. The fouldiers as yet not knowing what was become of Ofman, and loth to trust Mustapha in the palace, carried him in triumph to the old Seraglio, and there left him; departing to the lacke of the Visiers house, and so in the evening to their Rendeuous, where they kept both good guard and good order in the city, from fires and other infolencies. Sultan Ofman amaled with these newes, so soone as they had left the court, came out, and called to councell in the night Hazein Baffa late Visier in the Polish war, and the Aga of the Ianizaries, both faithfull to him, and demanded their advice: first having sent to the old Scraglio, to practise the women there to strangle Mullapha; but some of them taking his part, a new vprore began in the house between that Sex; and the foldiers that kept watch hearing the noise, entred in and rescued him, & from thence removed him to the chambers of the Ianizaries, wherethey gar-F ded him for that night in an ill lodging. All this while, of man consults what course to take. These two his friends, and some others, tell him that the case was desperat, and could not be fed ouer, and his first request was a cup of water. Whom they tooke vp, and instantly proclaimed him their Emperour, which he was loth to accept, in a manner ashamed to be raised to that dignity. How unstable are the estates of the greatest Princes I for he that was but euch now in the jawes of death, naked, started, and dying for thirst, is become a great Monarch, cured but by a desperat remedy : and therefore they agreed, that the Aga should go and perfuade with the Musti; and that the King in the morning should suddenly present himselfe to the foldiers at their owne dore, and make experience what his presence, his submission, and G his beneuolence promised, could worke, to move them to loyalty or compassion. Which counsell early in the morning they put in practife. The King accompanied with the Musti (who neuer confented to his deposing, though he fauoured the fouldiers against the Visier) with Huzein Bassa, and about twelve horsmen, went directly to the Ianizaries Colledge, where Mustapha was kept, and there in teares made them an oration; offering great recompence, repenting of his errour, and finally invoked them by the merits of his father and all his Ancestors, to have some pity vpon their true Master. The multitude (tam prona in misericordiam quam immodica sautia fuerat; sometime as prone to pitty as they were before to hatred) now knew not what to do; a filent murmure ran among them, and they were halfe concerted: but the Aga of the Ianizaries thinking to merit of the King, and beginning to plead unfeafonably for him, with some harsh words of vpbraidure (vt natura maris omni flatu venti turbida; as the nature of the sea is to swell with enery blast of winde) anew moued their fury, so that they cried out Treason, and fell vpon him and Huzein Bassa and cut them into peeces, euery man teking a part of their flesh to satiate their reuenge. The Musti would speake, but was with. drawne by some, for respect to his place, and with difficulty conneied away. Now the poore Ofman faw his friends flaine, and knew not which way to connert himselse, but binding up his eies with a napkin, expected death as the last of their fury. But they carried him first before Mustapha, and accused him as the disturber of the peace of the Empire, and demanded sentence against him (More vulgi suum quisque flagitium alijs objectans.) The forsaken Prince pleaded for life, and the new King knew not how to condemne, but nodded and agreed to all that was propounded. At last they consulted with themselves, and put him vpon an horse (an infolent Spahy changing turbants with him) and fent him away prisoner to the scuen towers, ynder good gard (in his passage begging a draught of water at a fountaine) and then returned to their new master, and placed him in the Seraglio and Imperiall Throne; where he had need to have good broaths and nourishment to restore his decayed body.

The fouldiers now thought all was done, and (only facking the houses of Huzein Bassa and fome others their conceived enemies) returned in quiet to their feuerall lodgings, and had no further malice. But the new Vifier Daout Baffa, made by Mustapha, knew well, if Ofman lived, that this stormed might passe ouer, and he would as easily, and by the same means returne to his estate, as he fell from it (vulg as vt mos est cuiusque nout mosses cupidum :) Therefore he confulted with some few interessed in Mustapha's preferment, and thereby obnoxius to Osman, to fearch how many of the Royall bloud were left aline, and refolued if there remained two to make an end of ofman. Two of his brothers were found, the one about thirteene, the other about nine yeares of age: and thereupon the Visier went himselse to the prison with a packe of hangmen, and gave order to strangle the vnfortunate Prince: who now having had no rest in two nights, and thinking himfelfe fecure for a feafon, was newly falne affeep : but awaked by the comming of these messengers, asked, What newes? and blaming their sudden introson, they at first stood amazed, and the King made shew to defend himselfe; but a strong knaue strooke him on the head with the battle-axe, and the rest leaping upon him, strangled him with much ado. Thus one of the greatest Monarchs in the World was first affronted by [mutined troups, his owne flattes, almost vnarmed, and few in number, no man taking up a sword to defend him: and they who began this madnesse, not meaning to hurt him, by the increase of their owne fury, which had no bounds, deposed him against their owne purpose, and at last exposed his life, against their will, to the counsels of other men whom they equally hated, And now they mourned for their dead King as freshly as they raged vireasonably; knowing they had fained their honour, being the first of their Emperors they ever betraied, and that they had fet up another that in all likelihood they must change for disability. Nunqual that documenta fors majora quam fragili loco ftarent superbi.

This was the last act of the life of Sultan Ofman; but his intents and great delignes, which drew upon him this fatall blowwill not be unworthy the communication the practiles, ich M fons, secrets, and counfels, of all actions, being the soule of History, and resgesta but the bare carkaffer and, as many ages have not produced to firange an example of the incertainty of humane greatnesse, so in the disposition thereof, and in the waies leading thereunto, there was

A feene euidently the wonderful prouidence of God, in confounding the counfels of the worldly wise, who had laid a foundation of new greatnes, wherby this Prince aspired the universall Monarchy. And the world may see voon how weake soundations this Monarchy was at first builded, how easily it was now shaken & corrupted; how their Kings are subject to the rage of a few slaues, how Anarchy hath prepared in as easie prey to any able hand that would attempt it. From the inuation of Poland all these changes tooke their beginning. Sultan Osman aduanced to the throne in his youth, full of heat and bloud, being of a great and haughty spirit, very couragious, strong of body, and a mortall hater of Christians, envious of the glory of his ancestors, and ambitious to raise his name aboue any of theirs, had projected in himselfe the conquest of the remaines of the bordering Europe. But to so great designes, The Goard B he had one vice that refifted all hope of prosperity, which was extreme avarice; vinaturall to figure to con-

youth, and a symptome of the decrepit age of Monarchy: Phi vires luxu corrumpebantur, con. your Europe. traveterem disciplinam & instituta majorum apud quos virtute quam pecunia res militariis melius steit. His first enterprise was that of Poland, moued by the incursions of the Costackes; which then he vndertooke of his owne head, without the counfell of any of his Vifiers (who in a tyranny grown to a height by ease, and wealth, are ener corrupt and lazie) and against the liking of all the fouldiers, who (contrary to their inflitution, being married and fathers of families, entered into trades, receiving nothing in war more than in peace, befides danger and trauell) are not eafily drawne from their owne chimnies. This action he thought fo cafic, as he had disposed of his conquest, and divided the live lyons skinne. But being met you the c borders with a poore army in comparison, he was first arrested at Chotyn, a little fortresse, which hee was faine to leaue behinde him vntaken; and then feeking to advance into the plaine country, by forcing the trenches of the Chancellor of Poland opposed against him, he could neuer procure his Ianizaries to fight, though ingaging his person once or twice beyond the regard of his quality, and his owne troupes ready to mutine against him, or to forfake him; hee was at last enforced shamefully to raise his campe, and to accept of any treaty to faue his outward honour. In this attempt hee loft aboue a hundred thouf and hortes for want of fodder, and eighty thousand men for want of fighting: for they would rather dic running, or pillaging, or cating, than in the face of the enemy. For this diffrace he conceined for inward, and rooted an indignation against the Ianizaries, and so justly, that he often lamented D himselse, and complained, that he was no King that was subject to his own slaues, upon whom he spent great treasures, and yet they would neither fight in war, nor obey in peace, without exacting new bounties and priviledges. Delanir Baffa, a man of great wit and courage, lately called from the Easterne parts, where he had long gouerned with honor, who came in though late, yet in a very braue and warlike equipage, about all other his captains, was fuddenly made great Visier, the former Huzein Bassa being in the same difgrace common with the souldier, though not in the same fault. This man was neuer bred at Court, but had lived many yeares in action, and so had neither faction nor dependance at the Port, but stood upon himselfe and his owne merit: and being now unexpectedly advanced to this high dignity, he wrought upon the Kings discontent, and nourished it : and in conclusion brake with him, That it was true he was no Emperor, nor could be fafely aliue, while the Ianizaries had the power which they lately vsurped. Informing him, That they were corrupted from their antient institution, and were lazie cowards, given over to case and lust: Et animi per libidines corrupti nibil hone. frum remaner. But if his Majesty would pull up his spirits, and sollow his advice, hee would prouide him a new foldiery about Damascus, of the Coords, men euer bred in the frontier, with hardnesse and warre, of great courage and experience; and that of them he should creek a new Militia, that should wholly depend of him, entertaining forty thousand in pay, which should alway be his guard: and that in the distribution of every Province, he should constitute that the Begler-begh in his gouernment should traine some of the inhabitants, who in all occasions of making a great army, should be in readinesse, and thereby he should spare infinite treasures spent upon these drones that eate up his estate; and with men of new spirits and hopes, he should be enabled to do greater matters than any of his ancestors; but withall he defited the King to communicate this counfell to no man; nor to trust his life upon anothers fecreey. Delanir Baffa neuer reuealing himselfe to any but the King, who extremely pleafed pleased with this advice, that flattered his owne humour, consented, and remitted all to the G Visiers direction, who was a true souldier, and a very wife man, able by his credit in Asia, to performeall he had vndertaken: for he was exceedingly beloued in those parts, very rich, and had kept Damascus, whereof he was Gouernour, for himselse in a late rebellion. Vpon this conclusion betweene them, it was first agreed, That the King should pretend to go in person either to visit Mecha, or against the Emir de Sidon, who was moued to take armes really to affift in the defigne; but they vsed it to colour the departure of the Emperour: which when it was well weighed, was found, that then the army of the lanizaries must be kept together. which could not agree with their ends. Hereupon the journey of the pilgrimage was divulged. That the King might vnder the shadow of an holy devotion goe out with a small traine, and disperse those who were suspected to him. And for this, preparation was made, M but somewhat too grossely, by melting of all the Plate, Saddles, furniture of house, Lames of Churches, and what socuer could more easily be conucied away in mettall, with all the iewels and treasury. This gaue the first suspition, which was confirmed by diuers vnaduised words let fall from the King; of disdaine against the cowardise of the lanizaries, and thathe would shortly finde himselse souldiers that should whip them : and lastly, dismissing all his household, except some sew select; the discontented fort observed this and betraied him. Delawir Bassa kept his own secret, and in the mean time prepared by his friends in Asia twenty thousand men, about Damascus ten thousand, from the Coords as many, besides those in readinesse of the Emir de Sidon; and all vpon pretence of defending the borders of Persia, who might take some advantage of the changes in those parts: and gaue order, That all these should meet the King at Damascus, where hee would presently cut off his guard and stay there, vntill he had regulated his new army and discipline, and then to returne triumphant to Constantinople, and veterly root out the order of Ianizaries, Spanies, and Timariots, and to exauctorate all their captaines and officers, to fettle a new Gouernment, and to change the name of the city. And these things succeeding, hee then resolved with his new souldiers to attempt the recovery of his honour in Christendome; in the meane time to hold a diffembled friendship there in all parts. Certainely, this was a braue and well grounded designe. and of great consequence for renewing of that decaied Empire, languishing under the infolencies of lazie slaues, if God had not destroied it: it being very true, That the Turkish Emperour stands at the deuotion of his owne troupes for peace, or war, life, or death, and is in effect nothing but the Steward or Treasurer of the Ianizaries. If this project had taken effect, what events it might have produced by a civill war, is not easie to judge. For doubtlessethe fouldiory would have fet vp another King, and maintained him as well as they could, and the Europeian part had beene in danger to have beene to meaway by the division, Besides, Detauir Bassa having the King and the treasury in his possession, and his owne credit so great, and his inclination velle imperare, to willing to beare rule, once discouered, it might well be thought that hee had fome ends of his owne to there a part of this mighty effate: if on the other fide the Visier had proued true and faithfull, the reformation and new erection of the discipline of war, and the encrease of treasure consequent to the dismission of the old Milita, would have beene fearefull to all Christendome; but Phi est spiens? whi disquisitor saculi hu- I jus? Perdam sapientiam sapientum, & vanam reddam intelligentiam intelligentium. It is a great question whether then were the wifer with, That these counsels had succeeded, or not: for either division or subversion, or a new prosperity and enlargement of their dominion had neceffarily followed.

Obfernations

Some observations upon this occasion, will not bee impertinent, to those that define to know as well the disposition and vse, as the things themselves. First in the purpose of the fouldier, not at all to violate or hurt the King, much leffe to depose and murder him; but only to take away those about him whom they thought affistants in this project yet the fury once on foot, they proceeded by insensible steps, to the vetermost of outrage, against many innocents in that businesse (though otherwise obnoxious) and against the throne and life of M their owne Emperour, Vbi furor ingruat, innocentes ac noxios juxta cadere; where rage and fury hath got the upper hand, there the innocent and nocent fare alike. Secondly, in the degrees; that yet the King had not fallen thus low, if first he had not lost that awe and reuerence which

A alway attendeth vpon Majesty, if it be kept vp; by vnscemly offices done by him in the streets and Tauernes, apprehending many soldiers for perty faults; like a Constable, making his perfon common, cheape, and despised among st them; which was wont only to be seene and seared, as somewhat aboue humane greatnesse. And this he did also in hatred and disdaine of those that had in the warre forsaken him. And now in this last act, if his owne obstinacy had not plunged him into destruction, but that he had softened them by a reasonable yeelding to time, he had prevailed onely by time. Thirdly in the order, that these mutiniers having no head or direction, kept that reglement, that they tooke oath in their fury, in hot bloud, in the Kings yard, not to dishonour, spoile, nor sacke the Imperiall Throne; neither committed nor suffered any insolence nor violence in the city to the Neutrals, but rather proclaimed peace B and justice. Fourthly in the consequents, that at the third daies end all was quiet and all men in their trade, as if no such thing had hapned; only the lanizaries suffered no Divan nor Councell untill they had received a Donative as guerdon of their iniquity. In which also the infinite waste of treasure is worthy your consideration, which was exceedingly exhausted by three changes in foure yeares, and by the late warres in Persia and Poland; for every lanizary, absent or present (whose rolle was about forty thousand) received twenty fine Checquines of gold; besides the Spahies, Iamoglans, and other Orders, at every alteration: which amounts in all neer to two millions. And now those sellows that had tasted the sweet of profperous mutinios (haudignari summa scaleraincipi cum periculo peragi cum pramio) tooke such a head as could not fafely be suffered on not fecurely be taken off. Fifthly, of certaine presages C that fore ran: for Ofman dreamed in the night, That he rid a Camell, and being mounted, he could not force him to goe by faire meanes nor firipes : and that then discending in a rage to revenge it with his fword, the body of the beast vanished, and left the bridle and head in the Kings hand. Who next day troubled at this fancy, fent to a learned man familiar with him, for the interpretation. He excused himselfe, as vustit to give opinion in a matter of that consequence; but persuaded ofman to enquire of the Mufti. He also craued pardon; but withall faid, there was none fo fit to interpret it as Mustapha the Kings vncle, who was esteemed a holy man, that had visions and Angel-like speculations (in plaine tearmes, betweene a mad man and a soole.) The King repaired to Mustapha, who briefely told him, The Camell fignified his Empire: his riding, abuse in government : his descention or alighting, his deposing : the vanishing of his Body, the revolt of D busubjects : the Head remaining in his hand, only a baretitle; and that he fould fhortly die within a few moneths, and lose his king dome, onely the empty name of Emperour should accompany him to his grave. A fecond of leffe confequence in the Vifter Delanir Baffa; with whom his Majesties The East if Embassadour having contracted particular friendship, about fix daies before this vprore, he Embassadour manero vises and having no other hydrodiship to particular him to part went to visit; and having no other businesse but to perfuade him to stay the King from this train enjaintended pilgrimage, the Embassadour gaue him many reasons in the present estate of their owne affaires; especially, the Treaty of Poland yet depending. To which the Baffa replied very grauely. Then the Embassadour vrged the searc of some tumult, collected from the licentious speeches rumoured in the towne: And he was bold to deale plainely, fincerely, and friendly, That if any such thing should happen, the fault would be imputed to the Bassa, as E being of authority to perfuade the King; whom his quality and youth would excuse but all the fury would be discharged upon the greatest Minister: desiring him to consider the event, at least to take his affection in the best part.

The old Reinard flaied a while from reply : at last, smiling to himselfe, that he should be The Balling persuaded against that which was his owne counsell, he gaue a finall answer, That there was 1919 no remedy, he durst not hazard himselse to oppose the Kings resolution: but affared him he would so order the matter, as this journey should not proceed so farre as was expected. The Embassadour concluded for himselse, desiring then that he would leave him a particular recommendation to the Chimacham or Deputy as his friend. To which he fuddenly replied, Trouble not your felfe, nor feare, I will never remout fo farrebut that I will leave one of my legges in F this city to ferue you. Which the poore man fulfilled; for being murthered within few daies

delight, vnleffe it looke foreward to vse and action, either to correct errours, or by that light G to gather advantage in future, it will not be an unprofitable degression to observe what was like to succeed these monstrous alterations. It was feared, by contemplatine men, that the fouldiers in Asia, who had lost their hope, would not sit downe with this afront, but rather attempt some reuenge for the death of the King, who was their martyr for that some great Bassa, farre removed from Court, might apprehend this occasion, not to obey an vsurper, set up by treason; and under that colour to hide his owne ambition: or lastly, that the whole State would fall into combustion, and intestine warre. This they themselves foresaw, and it came to passe, as will appeare in the story; for within sew moneths Abassa Bassa of Arzirum declared himselfe reuenger of his Princes bloud, and troubled, and almost hazarded the whole Empire. The Persian apprehended the opportunity, and recouered the Province and H City of Babylon: and the same soldiers that had betraied their Prince, were neuer quiet until they had made some satisfaction, by restoring his brother and right heire : only it pleased not God to open the eies of Christian Princes to see the inconvenience of their owne vnciuil quarrels, while the diffractions of this mighty Empire did inuite to conquer it, and to divide

it as a profituted prey. On Saturday evening the first of Iune following, the Capi-Agaor Major Domo of the Sewar her the the bee of Sul. raplio, having received a fecret order to remove the brethren of Ofman from their lodgings. and in the night to strangle them; as he was performing his command, aided with a few of his carnifices to carry away the Princes, they cryed out: the Pages running to the noife, and incouraged by the Caslariaga, who had some suspition, without surther examination killed the Capi Aga, now almost euery Order hauing rifen against his owne head. That night they fent secretly to the Ianizaries and Spahies, to enforme them what they had done; and in the morning early hanged his body in the Hippodrome for a publike specacle. The souldiers returned in fury to the Court, in fauour of the Pages, and demanded justice against those that had consented to this wicked order, which had made an end of all the Ottoman race; only this Mustapha being lest aliue, who was so holy a Saint, that he would not people the Worldwith finners, nor endure any woman neere him. The innocent King protested he knew nothing of this purpose; and if such command were procured, it was gotten by subreption; and he was easily beleeved. But his mother, another Livia, and the new Visier, Daout Baffa, who had her daughter to wife, were vehemently suspected, It was a day of Diuan or Councell, but the soldiers would fuffer none, vntill they had an account of this treason. The Visier deniedall; the mother was a woman, and hidden in the house: yet it is very likely they both were guilty, to vahold and fecure their owne authority; it being rumoured, that the Visier determined to place subditiously in the roome of the elder Prince his owne sonne, and very like him, and to to governe Muftapha for a time, and by his remove to establish himselfe and his race for cuer. But now somewhat must be done to appeale the people; therefore Dasus Baffa was degraded from his office, and one Huzein Baffa, newly arrived from the government of Cairo, advanced to his place, with promife of further examination. But the fury once over, there was no great fearch not discouery made, for perhaps the Sultana's Chequines quieted the matter. Then, w Visier was a man without friends, yet very rich, of a stubborne and obsit- L nate nature, reported just in his waies, but peremptory and voffexible (Andax ferox, ac prout animum intendit, pravis aut industrius eadem vi) one from whom all men might expect much good, or much ill: he began his gouernment roughly, and undertooke to punish infolencies carly, and professed a reformation, or to be a sacrifice: A man fit for those times that were desperate: for the worst was, that he must at last endure their fury. In the meane time he procured a little awe, and restored the face of justice: yet it was thought it could not last long, the Ghost of Osman would not be at rest untill there were some parentalia made unto him. The nature of the Visier was unsupportable; but if he preuailed, and were once settled, he resoluted anew to change the King, and lay an obligation upon the brethren of ofman, for he did never thinke himselse secure vndera man governed by an insolent woman, dominandi avide, M desirous to rule. And what affurance could hee have in that Prince, in whom there was no judgement, neither loue, nor hatred, but as it was infused? and though the particulars could not be foreseene, nor where the fore would breake out, yet the whole body was ficke, their

In the mean time the Duke of Sbarasky came neervnto the borders of the Turkish empire. and ignorant of those great changes which had happened, fent a seruant with a Letter to the dead Visier Delanir Bassa, with whom only the Poles had treaty. The contents were, That the King of Poland had fent him to conclude a peace, vpon such conditions as were agreed vpon by the Visier and the Commissioners of Poland, signed on both parts; but that it was reported voon the death of the grand Signior. That the new Gouernment had varied from some of them: That he had no other instructions to intreat anew, but if he would give his word to the English Embassador, that there was no alteration in the intents of peace, he was ready to see B forward on his journey. This letter received by the new Visier was Greek to him, who was lately come from Cairo, and understood no article nor piece of the businesse: Which was so fecretly carried by Delanir Baffa, that Sultan Ofman and he being dead, there was no man had formuch as a copy or knew the substance of that agreement. So that the Visier giving good words, ashamed to confesse his ignorance, promised all things, but knew not what to write in particular answer, and therfore was at a stand. The messenger neuerthelesse importuned a dispatch, the which he had in general terms, and so returned again to the Duke his Master upon

With this Nuntio the Duke wrot to Sr Thomas Rome, and being very doubtfull to intangle himselfe in this vnsetled government, desired him both to counsell him, and to tel the Visiet C that he would not advance, vnleffe hee might receive fuch affurance of fafety and publique faith, as that he might ingage his credit to him:hoping therby to have both affiftance & witnes in all his proceeding. Which gave the Visier occasion to intreat the English Embassador, both to promife for the good viage of the Duke, and to haften him, and also to informe himselse by him, of the substance of the Treaty of Chotyn. Which being by him undertaken, it turned to the great advantage of both, especially of the peace it self.

The 17 of lune in the morning, the Prince Coresky one of the Lords of Poland, taken prifo- Prince Coresky net in the late war, recommended by his Maiestie of great Britaine, who had formerly made franted in an escape from the Turks captiuitie, was strangled in prison after two years of durance. This put all into murmur and deep confideration, for what politique end this should be don, cuen when they themselves desired a peace with the Pole, and yet neverthelessed did that which might veterly breake it. But it feemed they were at that time either caried with a brutish furie, or that the Prince was betrayed from home, by intimation, that his remuant nature would never fuffer the peace long to continue between the Crowne of Poland and the Grand

The Visier (who caused this Polack prince to be strangled) upon some spleene towards the The Visit at Aga or chief captain of the Ianizaries, took this occasion to cast the fault on him, and to cast imput to de fier him, and fent him to the Islands to be strangled; & gaue order to murder some other Bas- pole Magapua fa's and officers, that therby way being made to depose the Emperor Mustapha, to set up Morat the child, and brother of Ofman, many being of his party. Wherupon the foldiers rose all in E arms at the Seraglio taking the alarm at the medling with their Aga, rescued their Captaine and the reft, and demanded the head of the Vifier. Wherupon he fled, and order was given to kil him where he could first be sound. The soldiers also required the life of Morat Aga custo. mer, and divers others: but for feare of other complices they durst fearch no further into the conspiracie : only the Visiers house was sacked and infinit treasure taken; so as the soldier was quieted for a day or two, by making a new Visier, Mustapha Bassa, who was of a fost nature, and scarce durst do justice for fear of offending any man. Now a new faction was made between Mustapha and Morat, and it was expected hourly when there should be some great slaughter or massacre in the city; for of necessitie one side must fall.

There was then no fecuritie for any man, when the King and Visiers and all Officers held their lives and dignities at the courtefie of the mutined fouldier, who had tafted the fiveet of rebellion, and cast off all awe and reuerence, and could not easily be reduced to order, without much bloud and hafard of the whole. Therfore the wifer men retired from Office and imployment, and the infufficient did cause their owne daily change and ruine. The souldier Eccce adhered to the King of their own creation, and hee was in effect their creature, for they did G wholly gouern him. But the lawyers and church-men made fecret conventions, and fill practified fome great alteration; and feared not to fay openly, That the foundation of their State was diffolued, the king volaw ful, and all that had adhered vnto him lapfed into herefie, having despifed the inftitutions of Mahomet. They wrought by wife counfels, and held a large correspondencie with those of their own coat, and spread their confideracie to all parts of the Empire, to procure a faction, and kindle a greater fire than that of the soldiers: for at Bagdat the captain of the lanizaries rose and slew the Bassa, burnt the Musti and all his kin, and gaue his daughter in mariage to one Aslan Begb, a pretender to the antient inheritance of a bordering province, to cantonize that part. All Asia was in doubt whom to obey, and Cairo was eaten up with oppression: and that which was most dangerous, they had no sence of the sieknes in the court, whereby to cure it, nor any of them so wise as to diffemble it.

The 22 of August the extraordinary Embassador of Bethlem Gaber Prince of Transylvania ariued at Constantinople; who amongst other instructions had order to excuse his Master, and to declare the reasons why he had made peace with the Emperor without the knowledge of the Port: which were, That the war had continued three years in the kingdom of Hungarie, and had fo confumed and desolated the country, that it was impossible for him to stay longer in the field and to maintain an army, for the great famin and searcitie of all things which the foldiery fuffered, and could from no place be supplied: so that if he had not accepted of peace offered, he had bin forced to quit the country of necessitie, and by his seeming slight have left the enemy victor. Therfore he was constrained to win time, and to return into Transylvania I to refresh his men of war, and to re-inforce them : as also his own pressing affaires calling him back, his brother whom he had left Gouernour in his absence, having advised him, That the king of Poland, by the infligation of the emperor, by intelligence with some of the principal Lords, did practife a revolt, and promifed aid to make a new prince that should wholy depend vpon the Empire and Poland. Lastly, seeing the grand Signior had suddenly concluded peace with the Poles, he feared he should be left alone to the burthen of the war, in which the King of Poland being at ease might assist the Emperor, which he was not able to sustain: there forche was content to take the opportunitie to accept of that at the instance of the emperor, which he should have bin forced to do by necessitie.

Yet afterward, although he made this apologie for his master for concluding a peace, hee assured the Port, that his master meant not long to keep the same informing them, That the Emperour had made a league (being at that time quiet in Germany) to inuade the Ottomas Empire; persuading the Port to grant a Commission, with full power and authoritie to him and the Bassa of Buda (who had bin twenty years in that charge, and knew all the borders) if they saw it sit, to preuent the Enemy, and to inuade the Empire, or the kingdome of Poland. This demand was made by Gabor to insunate with the state of Turky, and to get a power dormant into his hands, to aduance into Hungarie if he saw aduantage, or to oblige the Emperour; and to assure the peace, by hauing means not to care if it were broken. But the grand Signior sinding himselfe, by reason of Ciuile distractions at home, whit for a Warre abroad, and that they saw Bethlem Gabor had no other thing in recommendation than his owne defignes and sortune, his Embassadors Propositions began to be altogether sleighted and neg-

The Duke of Sbarasky, who came to conclude the peace betweene his Master the King of Poland, and the grand Signior, after long delay vpon the confines did at length arrive at the Port, but they made him stay sine weekes before he could have audience, forcing him to give a Present, contrary to his Instructions. Notwithstanding he could not get them to enter into a Treaty, sinding nothing but salsehood and vneertaintic amongst them, no promise nor faith kept, no prisoners delivered, nor indeed any thing at all performed: for now that they had him within their liberties, they hoped to worke their owne ends, and to wearie him out, who had twelve hundred of his ordinary traine. They threatened to keepe him, and to Menounce a War against his Master: yet by the mediation of the English Embassadour, the Ministers of the Port and he were pieced again, and the peace concluded, as shall be herafter set down at large.

After

A After many difficulties to obtaine admiffion to the presence of the grand Signior, caused by the forwardnesse of the old Eunuch Georgi Mehemet Bassa, then in the place of Mustapha deposed (who discouring that the duke would complain against Tomsha Vayuod of Valachia, and his creature, endeauored by all fraud, cunning, threatning, and fastidious delayes, to diuert tained in many tyrannies, especially in the occasion of the last Warre, should be examined or layd open to justice) when hee saw that nothing could preuail, but that he must hatard a direct breach, by the discontent of the duke; and that the people began to murmur, and the English Embassador to protest him, he was admitted, and nobly receiued according to the pompous custom of that court; who with his letter of Credence spake these following words:

The Oration of the Duke of Sbarasky to the grand Signior.

Sigisfinited by the grace of God, King of Poland, Sweden, Gothia, Vandalia, great Duke of Lituania, and of many other provinces Prince and Lord: To your most renowned Maiesty, most mighty emperor of Asia and Europ, and King of many king downs and provinces, ever most happy, wishesh health; and by me his great Embassador salutes you with all convenient reverence and honor: desiring to your Musestic from the most high God, fulnesse of all prosperitie, happinesse, long life, triumph above your Ancestours, Princes worthy of all memoric:

Is high Maiesty of Poland, considering the depth and highth of the Decrees of the great God, mar-H welling with all the world, and praising his high name, doth comfort and toy himselfe, beeing more than certaine. That that Eternall power which hath preserved your Maiestie from all enill destinies of men, and from the bowels of the earth, and hath placed you in this shining Throne, buth not done it but for the publique good. And like a wife Gardener, who hath weeded out all venomous and noy fum plants, that be hath placed your Maiestic intheir roome, as anoble and siveet smelling floure, full of vertue, clemencie, and peace, defired of all the world. His Maiely my Lord and Soueraigne hath alwaies wilhed, That not onely the actions of later yeares, but of many Ages past, might have beene forgotten; and that that friendship and peace begun with the renowned Ottoman Kings two hundred and more yeares since, might have beenewithout interruption continued. But seeing that the great God hath beene plea-Sed to chastife the people of both parts, by the meanes of wicked men, that must be accepted for good, which commeth from his Dinine will. And therefore blotting out of memory what socuer is past, doth now returne to defire the continuance of the first antient peace, and doth offer himselfe unto your high Maiestie to keepe it inviolable, as it was maintained in the time of Sultan Amurath of happy memorie. In witheffe of which his sinceritie, be hath not apprehended the opportunitie of the breach begun by the Per-Sian, the experation of the truce with the German Emperour, nor the many revolts and troubles in Afia, nor hearkned to the instigations of many Christian Princes his friends and allyes, nor to the Tartar discon-E tented : but rather having refused all other wayes, hath with the blond of his own subjects, and the charge of his purse regained from the Rebell Valachia, Moldania, and a part of Transpluania, and rendered those Provinces into the hands of your Maichies father, and suffered no man at any time to disturbe on that fide the friends of your Empire ; giving intelligence like a good friend and neighbour to your Ancestours, of all your Enemies designes and machinations, and in as much as was possible, endeauoured to Preserve a good peace and friend hip which he offereth onto your serve Marely; contenting himselfe with the Capitulations which were treated at Chutyn, and those of your most happy father and brother; Praying your Maielly that they may be confirmed and maintained. And not doubting but your Maieflic will restraine the Tartars, as he will do the Cossackes, and that you will suffer no occasion of kindling new fires, be befeeches brour Maiestie to doe what justice you thinke meet, woon Contemit and Tom the who contrary to the agreements and publique faith, hath made foile and new incur fions into Poland, even Sincemy departure from thence, and with many deceits and falls deutees have defired to disturbe the happie beginnings of accommodation. And seeing that by the antient Capitulations made with the most Warlike Sultan Solyman, and his successors the father and brother of your Maiesty, the proninces of Mol-dania, the Ballacs of Silistria, and the Beghes of Ackirman ought to keepe the passages of the Rivers to G restraine the Tartars; and that those now in possession of those Governments are already knowne, and growne old in their rapine and Spoile, the King my Lord defireth your renowmed Majesty, that they may be dismissed, and their Provinces given to some others more enclined in peace. For Cantemir, it is a true rule observed, That one Tartar can hardly gouerne another, where both line upon spoile: and how easily upon any occasion new troubles are apprehended by those who are autient enemies, I leave to your Highnesse wisedome; in which his Majesty is so assured, that he doubteth not, that for the publike good and for the complaints, and teares of both subjects, you will also vouchsafe to accept the request of your friend, and a King your neighbor. and if all the World, and the people thereof rejoyce, and praise Godof the friendship and peace betweene your Majesty and the King my Master begun and concluded, be hopeth that the poore and miserable prisoner shall participate of your clemency, that they may joyne in the general H care to pray to the eternall God for encrease of your greatnesse. The King my Master doth therefore defire your Majesty to grant liberty to those who are in your captinity, as he bindeth himselfe to set free all such of your Majesties subjects, as are now his prisoners; and I do promise on the behalfe of my Master, that he shall be a friend to your friends, and an enemy to your enemies. In conclusion, he desireth all happineffe and prosperity to your Majesty from a cleere heart; in signe and testimony whereof, and of the briendship begun on his part, he honoureth you with a Present, which you may be pleased to receive with your accustomed benignity; and shutting your eares to such enformers, enemies of peace, as are found at your Port, that you will esteeme him a friend and neighbour of the most royall and antient Kings of your most Princely Family.

The fouldiers continued still in their mutinous disposition, even in Constantinople the head city of the Turkish Empire, and grew to that height of insolency, that going in troups to the court, they demanded all offices of gaine; to be Stewards to the reuenues of the Churches, which are great; to take the Farmes of customes; and there committed many other outrages which were vnfufferable. The Visiers durst deny them nothing; they drunke wine in the streets without prohibition, contrary to their law; and stood in companies in the open day exacting mony of all Christians to pay for their wine; and being denied it, stabbed and murthered without any punishment: and when complaint was made to the Visier or Magistrate, they answered, None durst meddle with them, who had murthered their own King; and the Bassaes themselves desired the Complainants patience, and that they would beare a part K with the generall sufferance.

The Ianizaries

About the same time, the Ianizaries in the gallies which rid before Smirna, commanded affault the bou- by the captaine Halil Baffa, affaulted against his will the houses of all the Christian Consuls fri of the Cornthere. The English with all those of the Nation, were forced to runne naked from their lodgings, and to swimme to the Admirals galley to saue their hines: they ransacked the lower part of the house, and carried away to the value of two thousand dollars; the French sustained more losse; and the Venetians at least ten thousand, and one of the subjects of that State cut in peeces. The Generall had much adoe to appeale them by threats or perfuafions, or to faue the lines of all; infomuch as they miscalled and threatened him, because he would not consent to their madnesse. In conclusion, he was faine presently to put to sea, or else they had I finished the Trade at that place.

In Asia there was then three open rebellions; one at Babylon, another at Arzirum vpon the borders of Persia neere Tauris, and the third in Mesopotamia. The Visiers at the Port diffembled all this, and durst take no knowledge thereof, nor so much as to fend a command thither, for feare of blowing the fire, which would have put all into combustion : whereupon they held a sccret counsell and consented to removue themselves, to prove, if they could recouer the desperate estate of that Empire, and tooke resolution to make Halil Bassa (the best fouldier and most beloued) great: Visier; and in his roome Dasut Bassacaptaine of the Sea; and the present Visier, Chimacham or Lieutenant at the Port; and in the Spring following, they resolued to send the Visier into Asia, with all the force they could make to which end M they sent into Greece, towarne all the souldiery to be ready at Adrianople, not daring to make a rendestious at the Port, for seare of new trouble; and so to passe the Hellespont, wide of the city, to appeale (if they could) those revolts, and by that way to draw the mutiniers from

A the Court into action, and to reduce them vnto obedience. And notwithstanding that there was no other symptome or prediction but such as threatned the destruction of that Empire, yet were they never prouder, nor more feeming not to distrust themselves, their only securitie being, That they had no enemie but themselues.

The treasurie was far exhausted, the revenue abated, by the oppression of every Bassa in his gouernment: the foldier increased both in pay and number, and so impatient of delay, that at euery quarter, (besides borrowing, and taking up the sarmes of the Customes before hand) there were so many intollerable exactions to raife monies, that the apparauce of domestique quiet could not long endure betweene two extreames; for meanes could not be found, and the Ianizaries would not be retrenched nor deferred. And this was their general effate at that

While the Polish Embassadout was treating the peace at the Port (whereof there was no great doubt, because neither side was sit for war) there arrived an Embassador from the great Duke of Muscovia, which gaue some interruption thetin, pressing the grand Signior to continue the war feuen years against Poland, according to the promise of Sultan Ofman: offering that his Mafter should enter into Poland with an army, and that they would divide the country between them. But his proposition was rejected, because they had had sufficient triall of his Masters cunning proceedings in the last war; for the Muscouite having made peace with Poland (before the invasion of Ofman) for fourteen years, and being invited by him to break it, and to inuade that country, upon promise that he would continue the war for seuen yeares. & make no agreement without their comprehension; first answered. That he could not break the peace, thinking that the other was but a flash of a yong prince. But so soon as he saw the Turks in the field and borders of Poland, then he began to hope he might make advantage; and therfore promifed Sultan Ofman, on those conditions mentioned to enter into the quarrel, And to that end dispeeded his Embassadour to Poland, with instructions to demand three things. First, That the prince of Poland should renounce the title of elect Duke of Muscouv. The fecond, That the Poles should restore a territory in the border of Lituania, taken in the latewars. Lastly, That the peace should be perpetual! threatning, That if they resuled those conditions, he would enter into the country with an army and get what he could. This Embaffador being arrived in the confines, heard news that the Poles had repulfed the Turke at Chotyn, that he was retyred, and a peace treated. Wherupon he feigned him felf fick, and fent back a post with this aduice, and his old instructions, desiring in this alteration some new order from home. The gouernor of the town where he lay, suspecting somwhat, intercepted the messenger and his packet, and fent it presently to the King. The man returned to his Master the Embassador as robbed, and was again dispeeded the second time, and sent backe with another stile, to wit, with letters of congratulation, joy, and offers of all help and continuance of the peace: with these the Embassador went forward to the court, and having audience, the King answered him, That if his message were sincere it had bin very acceptable; but he knew it to be a fugred treason, and no faith intended by the Muscouite, and therfore commanned him to depart.

The Embaffador protested yowed, and vsed all meanes to affure the integritie of his mes. fage; untill hee was confronted by the Chancellour, with his owne Letter, and his Masters in Arudions. Hereupon was this other dispatched to the Port to hinder the peace, and to offer their concurrence to continue an inuation. In the meane time the Mulcouite neglected no means to fecure himself, & by renuing two embassadors obtained a peace with Poland, which was then again confirmed. To which the Poles were the willinger to agree, not knowing what effects the negotiations of the duke of Sbarasky might produce at the Port; and now the Muscouite was forced to diffemble again with the Turk, and make his preparation to depart.

The great Visier Georgi enuying the authoritie of Daont Baffa the beloued sonne in law of The event Vithe Queene mother, and brother in law to the Emperour Multapha (who had formerly been for place the depoted) who had bin both the instrument and the counsellor to murther Sultan Ofman, (cor. acath of Darks ning that he should under hand gouerne in his reigne, especially because he countenanced in opposition the Duke of Sbaraskies businesse, he therefore practised to put him to death: but not daring to do it by his owne authoritie, and in vain to procure it from the Court, he firred vp the Spanies to demand justice of him for the death of their last king. This looked G farther than the first assent; for the subtil Visier, who was faithful to his true lord, & knowing the rage of an vinguided multitude aimed at a by-reuenge vpon others, whom he hoped would be involved and accused of the murther: and the soldier soon raised and mutined in the Seraglio, they demanded Daout, who instantly sled: but now that the busines was on foot, if hee were not found, the Visier himself was in danger: but the poore man was brought to the Divan, and there being called to publique justice, hee must excuse himselse vpon some greater person; wherin the Emperor and his mother ran a new hasard, which was the secret end. Therfore both of them for fook him and left him to the law, and without any trial he was brought before the foldiers, stripped, his turbant taken off, and on his knees ready to receive the stroke of death. But suddenly the Ianizaries came to his rescue, and carried him away to their cham. H bers. The Spanies who began this action took it in ill part, and followed with great outcries, That they would have him die; the others demanded that he might be heard in publique juflice. Thus those two mutined factions were ready to come to blowes. Daont Baffanow in fome hope of life, bribed the Ianizaries, and that day distributed 40000 Chequines of gold, and they promifed to protect him. Who did not now think but hee was taken away for fafety? But the Spahies followed their first resolution, and to appease the sear of that dissention it was agreed he should die. They that meant to sauchim could not, but preserved him for a greater example of justice. They would not now let him lose his head in the Court, for that death was too honorable for him that had murdered his prince. Then the Ianizaries fent him fecretly in the same coach wherin he had sent Sultan Ofman to execution : twice in the way I being dry with forrow, he drank at the same fountains where his late master begged drink, and fo was conucyed into the same chamber where he had murthered him. The executioners beginning to tie him, himfelf shewed the very corner where hee had committed that foule fact, and desired that there he might, if possible, expiate it: and so he was at last miserably strangled. Thus he had his reward, and God was just also even for the wicked.

About the 20 of February, the peace after many rubs between the grand Signior and the King of Poland, by the mediation of the English Embassador (whowas chosen by the Visiers as Arbitter of all differences) after many meetings with Diac Mahomet Bassa Commissioner for the Treaty, was concluded; the Duke having first been forced to send this following remonstrance for his expedition; which much mooved the Visier, and quickened the conclusion.

Y Our Excellencie may be pleased to remember the bappy and honorable treaty made before Chosyn in which a peace was concluded between the Ottoman Empire and the king dom of Poland, signed by Commissioners on both parts; wherin (with reference to other antient Treaties) is was agreed. That a great Embassal ador should come to the Imperial Port, as well to confirm and swear the peace, as to set in order some other incident circumstances, as then not sully taken into sonsideration. Since which, the King and Republique of Poland having elected me for that imployment his Maiesty and my self have received many letters from Delauir, Daout, Huzein and Mustapha, Bassal great Visits; not only promising a speedy end and dispatch of the conclusion of peace which on both parts is so much desired, but also a release of our captives, and all other effects of love and friendship, according to the antient honor of the Imperial Port; desiring me upon that assure to proceed with alacritic and expedition. And surther, it having pleased his Maiesty of great Brittain (a friend to both) to mediate in this pions office, by his Embassal and true proceeding in this businesse, agreeable to divers promises made unto him, which he accordingly Math informed his own Master; I was very glad of this homorable function, and boped to have sound a ready performance as is by his Maiesty and all the world expected.

To this end I am come to the Port, with full power and instructions from his Maiestie and the Re-

A publique of Poland, to conclude and finish a full and perpetuall peace, with all sinceritie and heartinesse, and in his Maiesties name to swear the same, offering to be friend to the friends, and enemie to the enemies of this Imperiall Portreciprocally, and to be ready to treat and accommodate all or any other circumstances incident to a business of sogreat consequence.

Since my aritiall notwithstanding that I have produced both the mentioned treaty at Chotyn, and Letters, how little I have advanced in the main affairs, and the doubtful consequences of a long protraction, I define you to consider, having as yet proceeded no further in substance, than the definery of my letters and prosents, and to that end there may never be imputed to the King and republique of Poland any slackness in present, or any breach in future; ont of a sincere and good desire to establish this treaty sure and sirm, and to open a clear and true heart, I am inforced to make this true declaration, and desire your Excellency to more maturely the motions following.

I do not repine at myne own flay at this Imperiall Port, where I receive all honour; I do not doubt of the sincere and faithfull meaning of the Emperor to conclude the peace; but the deferring hereof may against

First, your Excellencie doth know that the Cossacks are a people not easily to be restrained, if they bee once at libertie, and that they live upon their arms. They have ready eight hundred boats to make an inuation into the black sea: in the winter they canot move they attend onely the advice of the conclusion of peace: ther fore now is the season of inish and publish it for if by long delaies is shall be deserved unto the Spring, and that jealousic or their own desire set them free, your Excellencie doth know in wisedome how difficult it is, to reduce into order a people of that condition, which for our parts we are now able and readicto prevent the State having ordained to suissisten, and to buy their boats upon the first intimation of a conclusion.

Secondly, It is the order of our Ration energy Spring, to call a parliament for the reglement of all publique affairs; of which affembly I am a member: if I hall be flated here, and not able to render a reason therof, it will breed great sufficient and disturbance in the general resolution: you may consider that in all parts there are some unaduised men, friends of sedition and war; and many that make advantage of others troubles, who may do ill offices, such as the innosent may be sorry for but canot help

Thirdly, The eies of all princes are fet upon the honor and faith kept on both parts in this treaty, and accordingly will gonern their own occasions.

For the screasins I do in his Maiestics name desire your Excellensie to give me a Dispatch, such as may bring toy and content to all, by avoiding the miseries of war; and in such time, that the sows and commodities of winter shut me not up, but that I may return, as well to satisfie his Maiestic and the Republique in our generall assembly, as to retain those who may be cause of much trouble, without our consents.

There is no difficulties that I under fland, I am content to accept the antient and honorable treaties made with the famous Emperor Solyman and his successors, and now lastly at Chotyn i if there be any other difference, I have power and am ready to accommodate it.

My destrethen only is, That a present end and conclusion be made of a peace, firme and perpetuall: and that the Emperor will be pleased, according to many promises, to deliver and set free the captives taken in the lass wars: as I do in his Maiesties name give my word that all others taken on our part shall have libertie and passport to return. And if there have bin any dissipution made by occasion of my pressure for the reiection of Tomsha and Cante-Emir-Emirze, I doe make this true protestation, That as it is the request of his Maiestie my King in strendship, so there is no other end nor cause of that destrebut only to remove all occasion of offence and breach with this Imperiall Port, which those ill neighbours are cuer ready to minister. But if that be any inconvenience to this Imperiall Port, I onely then seek that better order may be taken with them for the suture, that they may live quietly, without offence of the publique peace.

I desire your Excellencie to policy b and consider these my reasons and protestations, which proceed only from a good and sincere heart to promove and maintain an invitable and good friends by with this imperial Port.

Within two dayes after, the Duke of Sharaskie tooke his leave of the Emperour, to the great joy of himfelfe and his traine, who thereby fiw themselves delivered out of captivitie.

Articles contracted between the grand Signior and the King of Poland.

HIS Maiesty of Poland having sent into our happy Port his well deserving and famous great Embassador the most illustrous Duke of Sharaskie, to offer we sincere peace, loyal friendship, and good correspondence, and to seeke that the antient peace and friendship should the of we anew consirmed, and the old Capitulations renewed, and that for the time to come there might be established an eternal peace and friendship. his kingly friendship bath him most pleasing to we, and the peace and friendship by we accepted: and wee have ordained. That all the antient treaties shall be renewed; and at the present have given this our Capitumtion with the following Articles.

I. First, That neuer poon our part, nor of any of our Viziers, Beglerbeghs, Beghs, Cadees, Officers, nor soldiers, any harm shall be done to the Provinces, Cities, Castles, Towns, villages, and other places pertaining to the King and State of Poland. And likewise poon the part of his Maiesty of Poland, That by his Princes, Ministers, or Cosfackes, nor any other his subjects, there shall be no wrong don in any part of our Empire, city, castle, towne, or willage, but that both parties shall alwaies remain friends to friends, and enemies to enemies.

And seeing that the Tartars of Dobrinza, Biaolograd, Keil, Ozu, and Silistra, and the people of Moldavia, do enter, inuade, and damnisie the State of Poland: We command, that for the time to come, our Beglerbeghs of Silistra, and all other Beglerbeghs of Bender, shall take care to keepe all those passages and rivers, to the end that herafter the said Nations shall have known that the said Ministers have we damnisie the state of Poland. And when soever it shall be known that the said Ministers have we degligence in keeping those passages, according to the treatie with Sultan Solyman, of happy memory, that such Ministers bee degraded and severely punished.

The Vayuod of Moldauia like wife shall never grant any passage to the said Nations. And when some it shall be known that the said Vayuod hath transgressed in this our will, be shall be degraded and severely punished.

And when some the said Tartars and others, contrary to this our will, shall make any invasion or spoyl in the state of Poland, all our ministers and governors shall apprehend and severely punish them: and as it is set down in the agreements with Sultan Solyman, all the slaves and prisoners which shall by such malefactors be brought into our dominions, shall bee set at liberty, and their goods restored to them again, and the malefactors punished for having transgressed our Imperial Capitulations.

And if any of our Subiects hall buy any person or Polish goods, uniustly taken by such malestors, and it shall be made knowne unto cus by the king of Poland; the buyers for having bought unlawfull goods their estate shall be consistent, and they themselves severely punished.

The Prince Chrim Tartar shall be obedient onto vs, and all the Tartarian Nation vn. M der his commaund. Kalgha Sultan, and other Emirs and Princes of his bloud, from hence forth shall never enter into nor invade any part of the State of Poland, nor ever do any dam-

A mage, either by the way of Moldauia, the open field or defart, nor shall ever enter into or inuade any part or jurisdiction of the same. And at all times that his Majesty of Poland shall give notice. That the said Prince or others above mentioned have broken this our will and capitulations, and entered and damnissed his State; for their disobedience, the said Prince as well as the others, shall be by vs punished and chassified; and we command that never any one, in any part of our Dominion, shall sell either people or goods robbed from the State of Poland; and sinding that there be any one that bath dared to buy men, or goods, robbed from them, such shall be immediately punished with consistation. And as before mensioned, the Beglerbeghs of Silistria, with all diligence shall keepe the streights of Osu, and never suffer the said people to passe; and if it shall be knowne they have transcressed they shall be punished with losse of their charge and office.

And when soeuer the said Prince Crim Tartar, or his Kalka, Emirze, or others shall by our order be called and commanded in their proper persons, to go to any part of the war in our service; if by chance they should passe by the confines of Poland, as it is set down in the capitulations of my father of happy memory, They shall not enter into any Village, Borough, Castle, or City of Polonia, or do any kinde of dammage to the people thereof; and sinding that they have given any molestation or hurt, they shall be corrected, as is aforesaid.

And in conformity of my my fathers said capitulation, every time that his Majesty of Poland shall invite and call the said Prince Crim Tartar in his occasion of war whiles he giveth him his annual stipend, the said Prince with all his forces and army, shall go, helpe, and assist his Majesty in every such occasion, and show all friends shi and sincerity: to which effect we have given order, that our Imperial Letters be written to the said Prince, in this particular, who shall observe all according to our will and pleasure.

And for the better establishing of this our peace and amity according to the antient capitulations and observance, his Majesty of Poland promiseth to send his great Embassador to the said Prince of Tartars; and (beginning from this present, the source and twentied of the month of Iune) to pay yearely to the said Prince his accustomed stipend in this forme following. Every yeare his Majesty shall send the said stipend into the Castle of Chotyn in Moldania, and the Vayuod thereof shall certise the said Prince Crim, who shall presently send his Embassadour to receive the same, by the hands of the Vayuod. The which Prince shall alwaies observe this forme, and shall be alwaies obedient to this our Imperiall Will.

And in tage that his Majesty of Poland should faile in any yeare to send the said stipend, E the Prince Tartar shall not suddenly rise with his army and inuade Poland; but, according to the agreement of Sultan Solyman, continuing still in his obedience, he shall certisse us, and we will procure and recouer his right.

His Majesty of Poland doth promise that from henceforward, the Cossackes should not enter nor come into any part of our Empire by the rivers of Osu or any other, nor make any spoile therein: and if the said Cossackes do enter into any part of our Dominions and doe any burt, we certifying his Majesty by our Imperiall Lesters, he promise the correct them severely, and to put so death the malesactors for breaking the capitulations, and violating the peace and amity.

And all our subjects which shall be made slaves, and imprisoned by the said Cossackes, shall be immediately set at liberty; and the ministers of his Majesty shall alwaies be diligent to punish the transgressors, and wholly restore those persons and goods; which they shall have taken from our said subjects, and that never any subject of the King of Poland shall buy any Ffffff on, it shall be no disturbance to this our peace and amity.

Alwaies according to the antient agreements, the Princes or Vayuods of Moldauia, shall NIV. there to his Majesty of Poland all due reuerence and respect, good amity and neighbour bood: and secing that the said Vayuods have ever beene as it were instruments of preservation, or of the breach of the Peace; therefore we command, that for the time to come, neither the laid Vavuods, nor other of our Beglerheghs or ministers, shall huild in those confines any new Castle, Fort, or Bridge; and that in those Castles or Forts of those frontiers which are already built, there (hall neuer any other garrisons be kept but Moldanians : and according to the antient Capitulations, the Tartars shall not inhabit, dwell, or till within those confines, of both nations.

And to the end this peace and amity may be alwaies kept betweene vs, we (weareby the XV. name of God, and assure by this our Imperial Article, that all the Embassadors, great or inferiour. which shall be sent from vs to his Majesti, or those great or less which shall be sent 1 from his Majelly to vs. shall alwaies be safe and secure, as well in their comming as their returne; and that there shall never be need of any other pasport, but that they shall be of ros by all waies bonoured and well received.

Concerning merchants, passengers, and other Polacke negotiators, they shall alreades come XVI. safely and securely by sea and land into all the parts of our Empire; and for customes, tolles, and other duties of their merchandise, and in case of debt, credit, suretiship, and such other like accidents concerning the course of Iustice and Law, we command that it shall be alwaies obobserved according to the agreements with our father of happy memory, Sultan Achmat, r Which Articles we at this present accept and confirme, ratific, and command that they be of all our subjects for ever punctually obeyed and observed.

Furthermore we promise, and in the name of God sweare, to observe and maintaine for euer all those couenants and Articles agreed poon and pritten in our Capitulations, by our great grandfather, grandfather, and father, and neuer to disanul any of them.

And whereas to (be w greater defire of fincerity concerning this peace, his Majesty of Po-XVIII. land bath (ought of vs by his said great Embassador, that the subjects of Poland may safely and securely come by the river of Turla with divers merchandise, and sell, buy, and trafficke, in Ackirman, which trafficke being weed will be of great benefit to both Estates; We ordaine and command from hencefor ward, that the (aid Nation may come and negotiate (afely and Securely in the said Ackirman. And to the end that this bufinesse be established and concluded in a good manner, we will give order to our Embassador, whom we intend to send shortly to be Majesty for the ratification thereof.

Which present Articles, Capitulations, Peace, Amity, League, and Correspondency, by the grace of God we promise undoubtedly to maintaine so long as we live in this World: and do hereby conclude betweene vs and our posterity, and the Kings and State of Polonia, an curlasting Peace; Sealing it and confirming it with these words, Friends to Frends, and ene- M

mies to Enemies.

Notwithstandingall this, after the Duke was departed one daies journey, where he flaied

to receive the treaty figned, they altered some of the articles to their own advantage, without his knowledge. Which when he heard, he complained anew by his letters to the Port of the abuse offered unto him, and made haste rather to escape than returne. But the Cossact the same time being stirring about the Blacke sea, the Visier and State (having nothing more in care than to flut up that backe Port, whereby they suffered much losse and dishonour, and could not reuenge it vpon a fugitiue people; which divided their navall army, being forced to fend a portion of gallies to defend the trade, the best part of reliefe of the city of Constantinople comming from those coasts) resolued to give content to the Poles, and to assure the Peace; that they might with more security attend their affaires in Asia and Hungary; which action was fauoured vehemently by the present Visier. To which end, hee sent answer into R Poland, with promises of faith, and reparation for the injuries committed by the Tartars laving the fault of milwriting the treaty vpon the Chancellor, which though they amended not vet they did explaine and interpret; and for better establishment and security on their behalfs of the peace, they resolved to depose Ishan-Begb Prince of Tarraria, and to send Michinet Gheray his coulin german and first of the bloud, late prisoner in the Rhodes, to take possession of his dominion; who undertooke to quiet and restraine that people; which he caused to be fignified to Poland, that the King might fee, these alterations were only for the full security of the peace of their fide, that the Pole might take the like course with the Coffackes, who were not as yet reclaimed.

The foldiers continued still in their height of fury and madnesse, and those that were to 1622 go voon the gallies for the defence of the Blacke fea, and other designes, being ready to de. The fealdhire part, robbed, flew, brake houses in the face of the Magistrate in the open day: What was it Bill continue not lawfull for them to do that had flaine their King, and made and destroicd their great Mi-inthir fary. nifters at their will and pleasure, as their Stewards and scruants and God did so blinde them. that they should not see that they digged up their own roots, and were made by his permission the blind instruments of their own ruine. The mint also was removed into the Seraglio, where was brought forth all the faddles, bridles, flirrops, that had any gold or filter yoon them, with all old plate, to make money to patch up a quiet, and to fatisfie and content the foldiers, and all little enough for the prefent, to faue the city from a totall facke. The Embaffador of the Prince of Transylvania, having changed their stile of excusing a The Embaffa-D firme peace with the Emperor finding the opportunity of a friend now made great Visier in durs of the place to aid their Prince, they negotiated new matter, assuring the Port, that by the troubles sylvania deof Germany, a faire occasion was given to recover Hungary, and to fet the crowne vpon their forced from Masters head; and that therefore if the Grand Signior would be pleased to grant vnto their the l'ori. Prince the aid of the Gracian army, that he would make another attempt to weaken the greatest enemy of that Empire, which they easily obtaining (the ignorance and auarice of the Turke opening a way to credulity, which was the constant advantage of Gaber, who could convert both ther understandings and forces to his owne ends) being in all fully satisfied, they departed the 20 of Aprill. Which resolution of the Port was much wondred at by all wife men, who knew how wifit the Turke was at that prefent for a warre. The Prince was then at Caffouia, expecting the iffue of his Embaffage, and in hope of Turkith aid; which beeing granted and gathered upon his frontier, and joyned at last with his owne forces, his whole army was not very great, nor had he any cannon to march withall to befiege any place: his chiefest trust confishing in his intelligence in Hungary, where he expected a generall revolt, and that all the garrifons would open to him, or at least some diversion in Silesia (which he was promised) facilitate his waies; and he was not in despaire, that upon the first appearance of an army, Morauia by the fauour of the Count of Torne, who had affilted his Embaffadors in the negotiation of the Port, and his friends would follow the same example; and this was the designe which his Embassadors had so long solicited at the Port, and dissembled at their first comming. Now there was nothing expected but a war; but not long after, there arrived a new Embassador from the Prince, without any mention of the affaires of those parts which made all men inquisitive, thinking he was either come to hasten the succours, or to change fomething in the manner and other circumstances depending thereon; but it was found that the States of Transylvania had affembled at Alba Iulia, and were very loath to entertaine a war, or to breake with the Emperor; and therefore dispeeded two Commissioners towards him, who were well received and treated at Vienna: and from the Emperor was fent to Tran-G fyluania the Bishop of Nitria. Whereupon a new peace was treated, and this Embassador fent to procure the recall of the former commands, given to the Bassass to move with their armies. Whereby it was suspected he never had any purpose to make a war, but only tobal lance by the continuance thereof his cares and last agreement with the Emperor.

The Baffa of Argirum in rebellion.

All men prophefied (by reason of dayly disorders) the fall of the Ottoman Empire. But now Abassa Bassa the Bassa of Arzirum who was joyned with diners others, and had made a great army, was in his march towards Angria, the direct way to Constantinople (Babylon yet refling in rebellion) with a pretence of reformation, he tooke nothing by force, but the treasure of the Empire. He held a generall Counsell in his campe, and sent to the port to require the Musti, Cadees, Bassaes, and antient Beghs, to take knowledge and to punish the traitors that M murthered the late King, and to fettle a new one lawfully, that should be able to gonerne, to reduce the mutined city fouldier to obedience and discipline, and to place about the Empetor some great Visier, chosen by the State, able to direct and apply remedies to the diseases then growne to a desperat height; complaining, that every three or source moneths, by the change of the Visier, the Prouinces were destroied (for they placed and displaced the Gouernors according to their owne factions) and so contrary orders were sent abroad dayly, info much as no man knew who was King or Visier, nor whom they should obey. These were his pretences, and if the present State would not consent to this affembly, he then resolued to come to the Port, and settle all things at his pleasure by the sword. The great Officers in possession of the Emperor and gouernment, loth to be called to an account by the souldier, tooke a worse resolution, To make a war, and made choice of Cicala Bassa for Generall: which he refused upon the same pretence, that in his absence alterations would be so frequent, that he should not please, or at least vncertainely, and according to interpretation. Therefore he required an absolute Dicatorship for the time, equall to that of a great Visier, or else he would not stir. This was granted him, and mony given out, and order to passe the water spee. dily; enrolling for his army fifteen thousand Ianizaries, & thirty thousand Spahies, But those did demur, and alledged it was a war against their owne brethren, and sought any excuses tather than to come to blowes. But the secret was, it was then Ramazan, or their holy Lent, at the end of which they were to receive their pay; and therefore they would not move, but pretended religion. Next day after their feast, when they should march, they shewed them. g selues in their colours, (having first held many consultations) and would not move at all, vnlesse the Emperor or great Visier would go in person. So every day brought forth new subject of trouble, and the Empire to a great deale of hazard and danger.

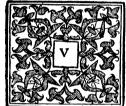

MORAT

Morat in tender age the Throne ascends. For wanton luft more apt than Princely ends: Sporting he lies in a luxurious bed, Whilest Bagdat is by Persia conquered; A greater losse than this, who can divine. Valeffe to lose the feat of Constantine. His other Acts, and how he still proceeds. Shall here enfue in ftory of his deeds.

THE REIGNE OF MORAT, OR AMV. RATH, THE FOURTH OF THAT NAME, ELE-VENTH EMPEROR OF THE TVRKS; HE THAT NOW SWAYETH THAT MIGHTY MONARCHIE.

Pon the last day of August, Sultan Mustapha, brother of Achmat, sultan Mustawho had beene twice Emperor, was deposed, and Sultan Morat, pha deposed, or Saltan Morat, fon to Achmat, and brother to Ofman murthered the yeare before, placed in bis placed in the Throne. But it will not be vntimely nor vnprofita- Throne. ble, to discourte of the causes and reasons of those great mutations, which are the intrinsique part and soule of action.

That State for fifteene moneths after the denth of Olman, was a stage of variety, the Souldiery vsurping all government, placing and displacing as the winde of fanour or disfanour moned them. In that time there were three Emperors, feuen great Visiers, two

Captiane Bassaes, sine Aga's of the Innizaries, three Treasurers, six Bassaes of Cairo, and in proportion as many changes of Gouernors in all the Provinces; every new Visier making D vie of his time, difplacing those in possession, and selling their favour to others: so as the whole Empire was in a manner fined ouer foure or fine times; fuch was the exaction for a welcome of every Baffa to their government. Huzein Baffa the last Vifier of them (a tyrant hated of all men, and now restored to the dignity by bribing the souldiery) consumed the publique treasure so tast, and exacted mony from private men so violently, to maintaine his faction with the Ianizaries, that even the Receivers were afraid, and weary, and the wifest of them forefaw their owne ruine in the generall confumption; when there was any murmure against him, he presently silenced it either by gifts or bloud. As soone as he had dispatched away the Generall Cigala Balla with the army for the suppression of the great rebellion in Alia (which upon the depolition of Georgi, and the making of him Vilier, was content to march) which he did rather to disburden himselfe of seares, by sending out of the way the Spahies, who were his opposites, than for any loue to the Srate: which Army, what infolencies they committed for thirty daies before their passing the water, even in the face of Iuflice, was as incredible as impossible to relate, he fent privatly to strangle Halil Baffa, George, and Multapha late Vifiers; hoping thereby he had removed all concurrents. Whether this gaue the occasion or that his sin was ripe for reuenge, the Spahies suddenly gathered head, and the old Wolfe fled to his trufty guard, the Ianizaries. The city was almost divided but the Spahies fent their resolution plainely, being the weaker in number, That they defired not to come to blowes with their Brethren; but if the Ianizaries would protect him, that they should keepe him, Constantinople, and Greece : but they themselues would depart and dispose of Asia. Which was a bold profession, but easie, the forces of the Rebels being of their fociety. The wifest foresaw the perill, and they all agreed to depose him; and so the Seale was given to Aly Baffa, a man reputed honest, but melancholy & vntried for so great a charge. Euery one faw those outward wheeles of motion, but the spring within that moued them was not fo foon discoucred. The army mentioned for Asia arriving at Nicomedia, five daies journy from Constantinople, shewed little bedience; many disbanded, and the rest had no G defire to fight with those of the same profession both in religion and in humour. The newes came dayly to the Port, of the taking of Forts by Abassa Bassa the head of the rebels and of other defections and combustions in those parts; and that that quarrell was taken up against the Ianizaries and the present gouernment, of whom he slew all that fell in his power, as guilty of the bloud of Ofman. This suddenly wakened and ripened the project of those who had plotted fecretly this alteration to restore Morat to the Imperial crowne. Hereupon the new Visier Aly, with the counsell of the Musti and some Captaines of the souldiers of both Orders, laied their foundation: they shewed the imminent perill and difficulty to restore or preuent the rebels by armes: the Ianizaries faw that they alone must (as the marke of enuy) beare the whole burthen; and therefore all resolued, that the easiest and safest way to appeale their H troubles, was to restore the true heire, the present Emperor, hoping that those who pretended their rifing for the loue of his brother, and in reuenge of his cause, would obey that Prince, and quiet themselues. Vpon this resolution they assembled at the Scraglio without any tumult, and defired to have Sultan Mustapha come forth and speake to the souldiers, and to anfwer to some questions: which he refusing (as truly vnable) they tooke out Sultan Merat and declared him King, with vniuerfall joy and acclamation: infomuch as the Ianizaries (but the day before his opposites) being shewed the want of treasure and the necessity of the State, were content to remit their donatiue and encrease of pay, vsuall at euery change: a wondet that was not like to last long, for many of them did afterwards repent, and demand it freshly.

The new Emperor the next day made his folemne entry into the city, a youth of foureteene yeares of age, fat, and of a lively countenance, and good stature, a Prince of two faire hopes for such a p. ople; whose actions afterward (though vnder gouernment) shewed that he would soone know himselfe, and proue of a stirring nature. At the returne of the gallies from the Blacke sea, who brought some Cossacks prisoners aliue, and some heads of the dead, he would fee them all brought before him, a custome vnusuall. This desire, and some answers he gaue, made all men judge he would be active, and cruell. All feemed then ferene and quiet, and neuer appeared fo great a change euen in affections. The most disordered did then assume face of obedience (which was once thought to be vanished that city) and chose rather submission to lawes than threatened destruction. The calme was as violent as the storme. The first actions showed peace, but so, as to prepare for necessity of warre. They sought out, and r dayly found the treasure, plate, and jewels given and conveied away by Huzein Bassa, which returned apace, and many voluntarily rendred them. The last Aga of the Ianizaries, who was but three moneths before Caja or Lieutenant (afterward Baffa of Cairo) did for his part receiue, and restore, eight hundred thousand dollars, to buy his place and peace: so that every day made new discourries; onely he that had beene the author of all this was fled away, and could then by no meanes be found: whose apprehension would have affured many, and have brought backe a great treasure.

Afia in that search for mony, and new settlement of affaires, was almost quite forgotten; so that the army was stated from proceeding; for it was beleeved, Abassa Bassa depended upon the new Emperor and would submit. But he had advanced too far to trust to any sase retreat, L euen although he was the indirect occasion of the raising of the new Emperor. Yet the way was not warrantable in the rule of Monarchy, nor perhaps fincere in the intent; for Kings scldome pardon those that are able to be traitors, and have shewed but a will to revolt; and that power is neuer secure which is too much. Sometimes they make vse of traitors as a safegard for the present, and for the suture a subject of their reuenge. And this maxime Haly Bassain the former great Asian defection approved with the price of his life, being taken into the fauour of Sultan Achmat in all privacy, made Bassa of Buda, and within source months strangled, under colour of putting on a Vest of honour. Therefore it was doubted, that they who had discouered so high thoughts, and exasperated the Ianizaries, would not so easily dispose armes, by which only they might be fafe; and it was then feared they had intelligence with M Persia. There rested one great difficulty, to introduce that awe of Majesty which had been trampled vnder foot; and it was a great one, when a people, like the fea, had made a breach into antient reuerence, and prospered; the taske of profitable wickednesse was not so easily lost. It was imagined that these changes would worke great effects upon the bordering parts of Christendom interessed, for they intended peace universally, to recover mony, and a habit of obedience and civil government. To which purpose a letter was written to the Bassa of Buda, to leave it to his diferetion in the mouing of arms against the Emperor (being lately excited therto by the prince of Transylvania) as a man experienced vpon the border, to doe what should most conduce to the safety and profit of the states for as they durst not absolutely prohibit them and recal the former licence, for fear of displeasing Gabor and the Bassa, who were united, fo they would infinuat their defires and fears by counfel, now only tending to peace.

In the midst of this appearing calm, the Ianizaries, some repenting (as was said before) and fome denying their consent to remit their donatiue and increase of pay, did anew sharply demand it, with threats of innouation : fo as they were forced to content them, and every order of men and officers that were not of the fword, were compelled to contribute to it. The Visier fent folemnly to the 4 refident Embassadors, to borrow 30000 checquines, as the friends and allyes of the Port, to whom in confidence they durft open their fecrets. Many old experienced officers misliked this betraying their own wants, as dishonourable, and valike to take diffect: which indeed it did not, for mony was so abased, and trades so poor, as the stranger had no ful purse. The new emperor to serue his turn, gaue out 400000 drams of gold, being his best vesfel, to make coin; which was stamped base, to meet with the insolencie of the souldier, who would take no filuer, as falle mony. Except in this fearch, the state and city appeared to be at fome quietnes; only the Baffa of Cairo (Boffangi Baffa to Ofman, newly made Baffa of Buda) ambitiously seeking the dignitic of grand Visier, by the gift of 100000 Checquines, his of-C. fer was feemingly accepted, part of the mony payd, and he fent for privatly into the Seraglio, as to receive the feale. But the Emperors best Counsell within faw how dangerous it was to give way to such innovations (beside a privat grudge, this man being the instrument to strangle the queen mothers eldest son, when Sultan Ofman went to the Polish war) where in sted of advancement a hangman took off his head, & his house & goods, being very rich, seised upon.

Cantemir-Mirza Baffa of Silistra was al this time in disobedience; whom the late Visier attempted to displace, and gaue order to the Chrim Tartar to remove him by force. But it was thought fit, not to thrust him further out, and to make him a dangerous enemy. Wherfore a confirmation of his government was fent him, a fword & 4 Veft, in all honor, the Poles milliking of it, he being their mortal enemy, & to be removed at their instance in the late Treaty.

At the change of the Emperor all men hoped for peace with Abassa Bassa the great rebel of Affa; but he shewed that he had further intents than to set up the brethren of ofman; when pretending obedience, hee fuddenly affaulted and took the castle of Tocat, which is in the Mint Abasia assault of Afia, 7 Beglerbegs and 16 Sanzacks being joined with him : all that part of Afia obeyed easies the him, for he oppressed none, only executing his wrath vpon the Ianizaries. This aduice beeing brought by a captain of that Order, made much rumor at the Port; the fouldiers raifing a tumult in the Seraglio, demanded to be led out to fight, and to have those of Asia declared Rebels:to which end a councel was called, where they received fo cold an answer, that they grew into fome diforder accusing Halil and Georgi Baffa to have correspondence with them; & feeming to doubt that the whole state did conniue at this action, to prosecute the first designe E of Ofman, To root out that corrupted Order which did diforder all gouernment : infomuch as they openly professed, If we be true Mussulmen and the Emperors slaves, let vs go out and fight with his enemies and ours, if not, and that you maintain them againft us, we are resolved to die together, and not to be masted by pieces. There was much likelihood of this, but that Abassa Bassa had proceeded too far: therfore to fatisfie the foldier, the banner was fet out at the court gate, and that of the Aga of the Ianizaries at their gate, and Warre proclaimed, That all the force of the Empire should be ready to march within four daies. When they faw this resolution in the great ones, (whether diffembled or in good ernest) that day being the 18 of October, 1 623, the Ianizaries and Spahies held a councel, and changed their minds; alledging, That Winter approaching, and no prouision made, they would not moue. The Visiers were glad, respecting their owne ease, and soall Asia was left to the curtesie of the Rebell, and to give other friends leifure to declare: of which the Persian was most doubted. In the meane time Abassa Bassa advanced and tooke the city of Angria, which was furrendred onto him as foon as hee came before it: but the Castle held our against him : and it was reported, he wept at the gates thereof, publithing the cause of his taking up of armes, which he said was onely in revenge of the bloud of Gggggg

Ofman; defiring fuch as fauored him to come on his fide (dividing the people) the rest to de- G part in peace every man to his own house. He did no harm, nor tooke the value of a penny this army was very great, and every lanizary that he could catch, he facrificed to the ghost of the dead Emperor. Men report, howas first aduertised by a dream to reuenge : after that, Ofman appeared unto him, and lastly Mahamet. He called himself the poor Mechmet, deputed to resorm the world from the great God. The Aftrologers publikely augured his prosperitie, and every mans discourse was ful of fabulous sears and prophecies. It was said he would come to the Port and demand audience by justice, and have the cause betwixt him and the murtherers of their prince tried by law, and that if he were condemned as a rebell, hee would lay downe his head; if they as traitors, he would execute the reuenge. And it was generally thought, out of the coldnesse of the Emperor and all the Visiers, that he was secretly maintained by them, and H came to fulfil ofmans defigue, to wrest the gouernment from the mutined souldier, and to root out their Order. For all the lawyers and churchmen insiled, and rather rejoiced than feared, The Ianizaries openly murmured, that they were betraied, and accused many, yet they escaped; and now few spoke against him as against a Rebell. Yet the first of Nouember, whether for colour or earnest, the great Visiers tents were past ouer the water in hast, with those of the Aga of the Ianizaries, and all the force which could be then made at the Pore, commanded to winter on the other fide in Bruscia, to amuse the robels, and stay them til the spring; perhaps being willing the blow should be taken on the other side, to faue the city from a general fack.

It was afterwards confidered, that to prevail against Abassa Bassa with arms was a doubtful matter, and therfore the Sultan fent vnto him a Capigi Baffa, with a Veft, sword, and a Letter: I giving him thanks for the love showed to his brother and his bloud, but now the revenge belonged to himself of which he would take care; and therefore desired him, if he were atrue subject, to return to his government of Arzirum, and to dissolve his army, and there to rest til further occasion of service. Vpon this order from the Emperor he excused himself, That the incommoditie of winter would not suffer him to retyre, but promised to live in peace untill

During these troubles, the Emir of Sidon possessed himselfe of the city and castle of Damascus, with some other places and forts, as it were in an instant; threatning lerusalem, having demanded supplies, or at least neutralitie from the Bassa of Aleppo. This desection was of greatest consequence, because he was a prince of descent, and a pretender in right vnto those K Countries; who had four or fine good ports to let in Christian succors; with whome it was thought he had intelligence, having in the time of Achmat retyred to Florence and Rome, and that he was in some measure able to subsist of himself, having 20000 soldiers in his army, and a good foundation and estate of his own to maintain them. And yet his actions were only lamented at the Port, and no order taken to stop or reduce them, excepting some Letters & promifes, the ordinary remedie that was then applied to those manifold troubles. For that State was then in a kind of lethargie, having no fence nor wil to make shew to feele the inwarddifeafes confuming it; either because they were viable for want of money (the treasure being much exhausted) or that they mistrusted their own souldiers, every day apter to mutine than to fight; or that the neighborhood of Abaffa Baffa did amuse and confound them: and so many L circumstances crossed one another as the symptomes of consusion, all things being equally feared, and nothing thorowly undertaken. Yet a little more fencible they were of Abaffa the enemie that was necreft, whose followers took a passage and bridge about source daies journey from Constantinople, as if he meant either to possesse himself thereof for his own meanes to advance his army, or to keep it that none suddenly from the other side might assail him but how soeuer, it manifested that he was not yet quiet, nor resolued to obey, as he had promised. This new attempt of his was very hotly taken at the Port, and many councels held; but (as all things do there) the fury once past, the warmth cooled by degrees in 3 or 4 daies, so that only a few more lanizaries were fent away to make garison, and to defend the passages, with whom were imploied the falle French regiment and their Colonel, all the force they could then wel M spare. No Spahies entred into that quarrell, as if these were purposely exposed to bee out in pieces: which many beleeued, by the faintnes and difunited maner of their proceedings; or els that they went out of themselves, knowing the danger to be most iminent upon them, & that the Emperor and his Councel did stil connine with the actions of that Bassa.

Bechir-Subbaffa who had revolted in Babylon, and held that castle against the Emperor all the last summer, having bin streitly besieged by Hafis Achmat Baffa, and in danger to be foreed fent his fon to Sha Abas the king of Persia for succors:wherupon he obtained some Persia an horse. Vpon discouery of which, the Bassa fearing he should be compelled to raise his siege. betook himself to diffimulation, as if he had such authoritie from the grand Signior, he made a composition, and not only pardoned Beehir, and all offences past, but conferred the governgment of that city and province voon him as Baffa, and foretyred his army. Yer although Bechir. Subbaßi was content to free himfelfe from the present necessity by treaty, yet really hee held the place for the Persian, and to his vie whose Agent at the Port demanded both that and Ahiska, as the antient patrimonie of his Ancestors. Bethlem Gabor having with great expedition marched over Hungary, and reduced most part thereof to his obedience, except the townes of Presburgh, Rab, Comoran, and some few other fores; his army confishing of 33000 Transylvanians and Hungars, and almost as many Turks and Tartars voluntarily following for booty-met with no shew of refistance vntil he approched Tytnavia, within four daies march of the borders of Austria : whither fending before some regiments of his horse, to the number of source thousand, to summon the town, they discovered some Imperiall troupes sent to make garifon therein, being some 2300 foot and 200 horse, and ariued within halfan English mile; betweene whom and the city they thrust them. selves. These troups perceiving they were suddenly prevented, and not knowing how far the Princes whole army was behind, tooke downe to a finall village, and fortified themselves in a C church and church, yard walled. The commander of the Hungars dispatched away a Currier to Bethlem Gabor, with adulfe that he thould fend him fome foot with expedition; relating the maner how he had inclosed this garrison. In the mean time he summoned the Imperialifts, and told them that he had taken possession of Tyrnavia for his master: And at the same time fummoned the town and told them, that their fuccors fent had yeelded vnto him; keeping all intelligence one from another, and both from attempting any thing. The next day. the Prince with his Vantgard ariued in fight, and then this Colonel fent foinc troups to make gard before one of the ports very near the wall. Those Germans shut vp in the Church yard. feeing the enemies horse under the command of the town, and no shot made at them, believed that it was true that the place was rendred; fo before the foot came forth to force them, they yeelded themselves and tooke pay of the Prince, all except fixe and thirty of the principall. who had licence to depart. Those beeing then won, the Citisens the next day opened their gates, and received Bethlem Gabor for their Lord; and thus these were gained without any firoke. From thence he marched directly roward Moravia, and fent before him a daies journev, eight thousand horse to discover and spoile. The Emperor finding these beginnings vigent, ordered the brother of the prince of Lichestein, to draw downe his garrisons from Bohe. mia and Moravia to the frontire; and fent the Marquis of Montenegro, with Colillo, Don Balthefar de Maradas, the Count Slick, Walftein, Tiffenbacke, Count Torquato kinfmail to the Pope, Sampach, and all his principal Captains to meet them, and to form an army for defence. There was gathered together fifteene thousand besides the baggage who being lodged at the foot E of an hill in the borders of Moravia, and many of their fouldiers stragling rogather grapes, were by the Auantcuffiers of Bethlem Gabor discourred, and presently befor, who took & slew feven hundred. Some escaped and gaue the alarme, or else the whole Imperial! Campe had beene surprifed without Sentinell or gard; these having proved as serviceable as the Geese to the Capitol. The Hungars having gotten the top of the hil, and feeing the Bohemian and German army fo neer in the bottom, and in feme confusion, resoluted to make triall how they were prouided and made thew of a charge; but finding them in better order to receive them. they retyred tone Captain only adventuring too neer, was taken prisoner, and carried to the Imperial quart, riwho being examined, told them, that the prince with a mighty army would the next night be in fight, and therefore hee adulfed them to prepare for their fafety, for that F he camewith a resolution to fight, and ouermatching them with their number, there was no possibility of other than death or captinity. The Imperials rather scorned than beleeved these threatnings; but the captain affuring them it was no time to jest with his own life and theirs,

of Moran that divides Hungary from Morauia, about which was a small trench, and within it a castle of some desence. The horse of Bethlem Gabor seeing them mooue towards that place. pressed in a gallop before them, and set all the houses on fire, which burned a day and a night. prened magazine before. In the meane time Bethlem Gabor arrived with his army; and the Imperialists stood in battalion to expect their fortune: but the fire being ended, gaue them leave to enter among the ruines and ashes, and to make the best of necessitie, where they fortified themselues, having no store of provision. In this estate being closed about thirteendaies, it was discoursed to Gaber by a prisoner, that they were in great want, and that the soldiers began to mutine, demanding of their captains either to lead them out to fight, and die like men, or to make such a party for them, as their present condition would admit. Don Balthasar General of the horse, in the name of all the commanders, gathered the army together, and acknow. ledging to them, first the great vertue they had shewed to abide at once the assaults of perill and famine, for their honour; and protesting that their case and their Generals, was all one for matter of allowance, intreated them to strengthen themselues with hope and constancie, and required of them an universall promise, that they would abide with patience, untill the end of O Rober then at hand: if in that time, neither God nor the Emperour sent them succours, he would make some composition for them; not doubting to finde Bethlem Gabor a Christian and a fouldier, though an enemy; and to this proposition they all gaue their words and faith, The reason of this short obtained time, proceeded not from any thought of supply from the Emperour, but from an opinion and custome, that the Turks would breake up their campe vpon Saint Demetrius day the fix and twentieth of the month of O cober; neuer ving to flay longer in the field for the incommodities of Winter; and that now they ferued in the nature of voluntaries, and had gotten their prey, it was likely nothing could hold them from rifing: but if that hope failed them, they then resolved to give the soldiers leave to make quarter for themselves; the Generals and commanders purposing to retire into the castle with some competent numbers, which they doubted not to keepe untill supplies or weather should force the enemy to dislodge. The Prince of Transyluania knowing likewise that at that time he should haue trouble enouh to stay his succours, and if they staied, hee feared they would prooueill Winter guests, and discredit him with his Hungars, whom they indifferently spoyled, tooke counsell either to force the enemie by that day, or to winne them by policie; but the later was the fafer way: for it seemed he had no desire to put so many persons of qualitie into the power of the Turks, whose prisoners by agreement they must remaine; and having also intelligence, vpon what hopes the Imperialists held out, hee counterwrought with the Turks, to give him a promise to abide with him fifteene daies after Saint Demetrius; in which time he pretended to deliuer the Fort and all into their hands , conjecturing as it feemed, that before that day the Germanes would make some ouerture, out of which hee might worke his owneaduantage, and obtaine his owne ends, and they would admire and feare his power and credit in the Turkish army : for doubtlesse hee might have forced them if he had pleased, but then he had made his estate desperat of any reconciliation with the Emperour, and must resolue to continue the warre; vncertaine of the constancie of the Turks, assured, they being once retired, would very late draw againe into the field; and perhaps bee doubted the various fuccesse of warre, and of the setling of the State of the Grand Signior in Asia, where all thingswere in distemper; and was somewhat carefull of his reputation in Christendome, which he knew was farre aduentured in this action : for which aboue twenty thousand poore foules lost their libertie, and endangered their faith. Therfore he made vie of his time and his wit, and the Imperials finding themselues deceived in the hope of breaking up of the camp, now no longer able to fustain their wants, sent Commissioners to him in the Emperors name, to treat some agreement. Hee seeing his fifteene dayes weare out apace, and the Turksbeginning to dislodge, accepted the offer; and that very day to give satisfaction to the Port, dispeeded one of his chamber in post to make knowne to the Vizier (a man not vneasie to abuse) that hee had done his vimost, to detaine the Turks to winter in Hungarie; but being notable longer to hold them together, hee was forced to come to a treaty: for to venture to affault the trenches, was full of perill; to rife without some conclusion, were to quit the place, to honour the enemie, and to weaken his owne reputation: to continue the siege after the depar-

A ture of his fuccours, would hafard his owne Army into mutinie: therefore he was refolued to make a truce for eight moneths; that feeing the grand Signior had confented to receive the Emperors Embassadour, time might be allowed for treaty and final conclusion. He gauchim infruction to fay, That as then he had not fully agreed, but that it was resoluted on to be don. onely with a formall referuation of the approvement of the Visiers, without which it should be held as not done. That he should require the finall resolution of the Port, Whether the grand Signior would continue constant, and maintain him in the war or not. If they resolved vpon Warre, then to demand prouision of munition, money, souldiers, and all other necessary ries, in season and in a measure, in those times impossible. If they desired peace, that they should give a draught of what conditions they affected. But withall, an absolute power vnto B himselfe to mitigate them, and to make such other at his discretion as the necessity of the affairs and time required for the profit of the Empire. The Prince at the first arrivall of the Commissioners of the besieged at his Quarter, discouered some jealousie and discontent in fome of his followers: Wherupon he called before him most of his Commanders, and defired them not to mistrust him, he shewed some reasons why he might be inforced to make a truce. but protested he would neuer depose armes, nor conclude a finall peace with the Emperour. except he would also disarm, and leave those provinces and the Empire in quiet. For though it were a hard choice for him to be bitten by a Wolfe or by a Dog, (which were his owne words) yet feeing he could better trust the one than the other, hee would make vie of one to curb the other. This gaue not full fatisfaction ; but the words of a Prince must bee current C payment, because they beare his stampe; for his meaning, or what he treated, he trusted none withall but his own breft. The messenger hee sent unto the Port, played his part so well and fecretly, as he gaue fatisfaction to that State, ready enough to beleeue well, and procured a satisfication of the Truce supposed then to be made; and for instructions in the intended treaty, he propounded in his mafters name three articles, and one Commission. First, That the Emperor (hould disclaime all right and title to Hungary, and thould leave the people free. and the Prince of Transylvania to gouern them. Secondly, That the Princes and all the prouinces that had fent their Embassadours and presents to the Port, and had made league with him, and had taken the Imperial protection, should bee restored to their pristing liberry and estates. Thirdly, That the emperor should pay a tribute of forty thousand dollars for Austria. pretended to be granted in the daies of Sultan Solyman. But the Commission was the key of the work, wherby the Prince, with the counfel of the Baffa of Buda, obtained ful power at his own discretion, if he found peace convenient; to make and conclude it, this last being (as was supposed) the end and scope of Bethlem Gabers desires: the other propositions onely a garnishing to make the Turks believe that he was careful of their honor and service; and the Emperor, that he was very powerfull, and much effeemed at the Port. Which all men imagined would produce an end of those wars: for the prince of Transylvania confessed, That hee drew not in the Turkes for any need he had of their fuccours, nor for any benefit intended to them. but to make a glorious shew to the Emperour, of his credit with the grand Signior, heiby to facilitate his ends.

After some time spent in treaty with the Commissioners of the army, a truce was taken be- Atmosfe tween the prince of Transylvania and the Marquis de Monte Negro, General for his Imperial mento and the Maiesty, before the town of Ghoding on the frontier of Moravia, where the Germans were befieged and letters presently written theref by the prince to the great Visier, which were dated blessie. the tenth of November. The mediator between them was the Palatine Staniflaus Turzow an Hungarian. The articles of greatest importance, or that were then published to the world.

That on both parts armes should be deposed for ten months (ending the fixt of September F 1624.) and all other acts of hostility given over. That there should of neither side any attempt The Assistance be made, nor by force nor fraud to take any castles, forts, cities, or places of defence during this time; and that both Germans, Hungars, and Turks should be alike comprehended.

This done, the Prince of Tranfylvania made a fliew of redeeming all the poor captiues tal H ken by the Turks, at his own charge, with some help from the Imperials, vpon whom hee layd the blame, as having failed to meet him vpon a passage of water, where hee entertained the Turkish army; but they not comming, he pretended the Turkes role in the night and carried them all away, to the number of twenty thouland.

The Prince warned the Turks to keepe in order, and not to straggle in their retreit, norte committany infolencie and spoil, the country being all in arms, and already inraged. But they tollowed not his counfel, which caused some 2000. Hungarian horse to set upon them as they were divided, and flew five or fix hundred of them, and recovered some prisoners whereupon the Turks vnited and returned, and killed as many of the Hungars, took one man of qualitie,

Vpon advice from Hafis Baffa General of the province of Babylon, That the King of Petfia The King of with a powerful army had entred those quarters, and that both the city & that country would be lost, if aids did not ariue very speedily; and the rebels in Asia continuing their insolencie, a War was fuddenly proclaimed at the Port, in fuch termes as neuer had bin heard of in former times; to fay, That who focuer took pay of the grand Signior in any kinde as a fouldier, if he came not to the rendevous appointed, with his arms, he should be confiscated, essemed as a Rebel, and his wife and children fold for flaues. This was fent into Greece, Natolia, Trabizond, and all the vimost confines of the Turkish Empire. Herupon the grand Signior and the wifest of the Bassa's inclined to buy Abassa Bassa, and to fend him a generall pardon and grant of all his demands, voon condition, That he would prefently march and turn his army against w the common enemy: fearing either the doubtfulnes of a battel with desperat men,or to force him to retyre and join with the Persian, where he might be well received. And as the present condition of the state then stood, the counsel was good but the Ianizaries would not consent nor hearken to any reconcilement with their profest enemy, but required to be led out against Abassa Bassa first, and so to proceed in the warrand because their own Aga, brother in law unto the Emperour, did not concurre with them in opinion, they murined against him, who wisely gaueway to the storm, and surrendred his charge, to which a Page of the court was presently advanced. Thus whilst it was unresolved how to proceed against the Persian and Abassassian jointly, who continued to spoil and put to ransom all the leffer Asia, and could not be reconciled for the lanizaries, nor safely attempted for the Spahies (between which two orders there E was as yet bad intelligence and emulation) the king of Perfia conquered, the province and city of Babylon, put to flight Hafis Achmet, Baffathe General of that defensue war, & tooke prifonct Chur Haffen Baffa a renowned old fouldier, cut in pieces all that opposed him, possessed himself of * Mosul, and Leska on the Persian sea, and dividing his army, sent partoward Van and Diarbeck, and the other toward Mecha; as if he had hope and designe to share all the Ear flern part of the Turkish empire.

His Maiestie the King of great Brittain having by his first letters in 1621, complained to the grand Signior, and commanded his Embassador to seek redresse against the piracets and insolencies of the inhabitants of Algierand Tunes, who in the two former yeares had is M ken aboue an hundred ships and Vessells of all forts, and had made slaves of aboue twelves hundred of his Maicsties subjects, and had then voon their wharfes a thousand pieces of iron ordnance, besides those in their shipping, taken from the English and Dutch; The Emballsdour pressing to obtain justice against them, of that they might be abandoned and lest to the

A justice of his Maiesty, without offence of the Port; the great Visier offred to give what commands should be required. But he knowing how weake effect those letters of course had produced in other occasions, and how little obedience and respect those common Thecues did beare vnto the Port (the Baffa's themfelues conniuing, and noutifhing therby their own gain) especially considering, that what face and seeming dislike soener was shewed and pretended. vet inwardly the Turks did take pleasure and glory, that the Christian was robbed weakned. and spoiled, under the shadow of peace; did utterly refuse to accept of such feigned remedies, but infifted voon two points, wherby only there might be some hope of redresse in that affaire.

First. That the grand Signior would send an expresse Chiaus to Algier and Tunes, to call to the Port some of the principal inhabitants and aduenturers of all the Orders of those Cities, such as fent and armed out the ships of course; that being convented face to face, and accufed & continued of the fact, the State might be truly informed of the confequence of their outragious theeury, and provide such remedie as should be requisite and sufficient in the fir-

Secondly, That the Baffa's who were fent from the Port rather for custome and pretence of dominion, than for any great fruit or hope of obedience (yet because they returned at the end of their government, they might be responsible for matters concerning themselves) might receive firid and absolute order not to take the tenths of the prizes, because being diffinitereffed, and sharing no profit, there might be more hope, by their authoritie, of execution of the o grand Signiors pleafure in restraint of their robberies.

These propositions at first found much opposition, but the Embassador resusing all other ordinary & vneffective means, required either this form of proceeding, or that the grand Signior would declare them out of his protection, and standing neutrall, Icaue them to their own defence: protesting, That this course was offered for good respect to the Port; yet if really some order were not established, that there was no remedie but to redresse these injuries by the fword, and to punish those Barbarians as Inimici humani general, publique enemies to mankind. Defiring the Visiers to take it to serious consideration, that seeing amitie and correspondence between the kingdom of England and the Turkish empire, did principally and almost integrally depend your commerce and trassingue, the whole foundation was thaken and D made vicleffe to both, by the interruption of those thecues. These reasons concurring with the diftemper of those times, and their own fears, so far prevailed, that by a general confulration it was concluded, to fatisfie the Embaffador in his own waies; and accordingly a meffenger was dispatched from the Port to call to justice some of all the orders, to answer as Deputies for the Cities, before the Visier and Divan, in such accusations as should be objected a-

This negotiation was begun and finished, as much as concerned the authority of the grand Signior, Anno 1622; but being not perfected and translated until the next, and that time full of various mutations, we have thought fit to continue the thred of the former history, and not to mingle and confound it with relations of feueral and unlike fubic as and relations; and al-E though this part be found a little out of his own time, yet both wil be the clearer by the diffe-

The Baffa and inhabitants of Algier having received letters by Mehemet Aga, both reprehending them for infolencies committed youn the English nation, and commanding them to keep the peace of the Empire, and to bring with him some of the principall of that gouernement, did ele& foure and twenty Commissioners (amongst whom the Musti was both head and Aduocate) and gaue them inftructions and order to recriminate and accuse the Englith of many depredations and injuries; hoping thereby either to extenuate their own offence, or by pretending lust cause, to leave themselves at libertie to continue their piracies. And the Baffa and city of Tunes having received by the faid meffenger reprehensions and commands to the like effect, they resolved to consult with their sellomes of Algier, and in their passage to Constantinople, to joyne to them two of their Councell, and gaue them instructions to bee assistant. But with this caution, That they should not declare themselves openly, but to observe the proceedings of those of Algier, and to conforme with them; that if they were inforced to make peace, they should concur and be comprehended; but if it were post. G ble for both to escape that they should scaue the breach open, and themselves at libertie, e for both to escape that they include a ple in the month of November, in that years in the reign of Mustapha, and made their first addresses privatly to the English Embassador, subtily pretending to end all differences fecretly with him's because they were vinwilling to answer and discouer to justice, what infinite spoiles they had gotten, and that if they could accommodate with him, and treat without the authoritie of the Port, they r. folued to promife any thing, which they meant not to observe, and so escaping for the present, they hoped to doe more mischiese, by the advantage of the securitie of the English, and their owne breach of faith. But the Embassador resuled to treat with them, as being subjects, and not sui juris, and to give them any hearing, but in the presence and by the mediation of the great Visier, Wher. H upon they applied themselues, and returned to their resolution of complaint, and the Embas. fador profecuting their accusation, after many meetings and disputes, by the interposition of Halil Bassa, there was an Amnestia accepted on both parts, and a peace concluded on the Articles and conditions following, which were ratified by the proper fignature of the grand Sig. nior Mustapha, and re-confirmed by Sultan Merat, proclaimed in Tunes and Algier, and recommended by scuerall letters from the Visier and Captaine Bassa, to the Bassa's, Caddees, Imperiall Commands fent by the Grand Signior to the Baffa's of Tunes and Algier, Caddees, Aga of the lanizaries, Dyes, Captaines, Antients, and other gouernors.

Or high and Imperial Firmo being come unto you, know, That from the time of our great Grand. father, Grandfather, and Father of happy memory, the Kings of England have alwaies bin firme and conftant with all sinceritie, in friendship, league and correspondencie with the Imperial Port, our glorious progenitors, and with our Maiestie. And in conformicie of the Imperiall Capitulations, League, and peace heretofore agreed upon betweene both parties, and alwaies until now observed of us; For a smuch as the English nation, their Merchants and subjects, with their merchandise, ships, and goods, K are free to come and go, traffique and negotiate fafe and secure in all the parts of our Empire; it having neuer been our Imperial will and permission, that by any of our subjects or slaves they should at any time be troubled, spoiled, or damnified. Which Nation, whilest under the shadow of our justice and protection they passe through the seas with their shippes and goods, for traffique and negotiation, divers of young stances of Algier and Tunes, without consideration or respect of the friendship, peace, and League betweene vs and the faid King, where focuer you meet with the flups of the faid Nation, either at fea, or in any port or haven, take the faid Ships, spoiling them of their goods and merchandise, making slaves and killing the men which you finde in their ships, a thing not onely uniuse, but also contrary to our Imperial capitulations. Wherfore that for the time to come the faid Nation Ball not be so uniustly spoiled and indammaged, there baue bin sent to you divers times our Imperiall and expresse commands but you showing L your selves arrogant and disobedient, (as we under stand) do still continue to rob and spoile the said English, contrary to our said capitulations, intention, and will. The concourse of merchants and traffike being the nutriment and splendor of kingdoms you shall under sand, That it is by no means our Imperial will, that the faid Nation, now in league and friendship with ws, be any more in like fort, contrary to aur capitulation, will, and promise, spoiled and molested. Which insuries and other wrongs don unto them, being a great dishonor to our state and Imperiall Maiestic, all you have not only descruedly fallen into our inst displeasure, but also are worthy of all diferace, shame and punishment. And to the end hereafter all things may be performed by you, according to the tener of our Imperiall Capitalations, and that all such as have committed such insolencies and spoiles, be apprehended and worthily punished, we have at this present under our Imperiall hand affirmed and commanded, and have fent you this our Imperial commandement by M this bearer Mehemet Aga, who as foon as you shall be there arrived, we command you that you call together all, great and small, noble and mean, which dwell in the said places of Algier and Tunes, and publike ly in the presence of them all with a loud voice you shall reade this our imperiall commandement; and ofin

A that, with the afiftance and aid of this our Meffenger, you have delinered into the hands of the English men, there appointed for the same, without further excuse and delay, all fur h Englishmen, their goods and merchandises and ships; which have beene taken, contrary to our Imperiall Capitulations, from the faid N. sion ; all those transgressors and malefectors, who soever they be, who have committed these outrages, and canfed fuch diffurbance to the peace league, and friendflip, you fhall without any fauour chaftife and punish according to their defents. And afterward ye shall have care, that the Nation, Merchants, and Subjects of England be not fo unjusty sported, burt, or molested, contrary to our Imperial promise and will. Therefore you fall publikely protest and declare unto all, That hereafter no man do trouble or moleft ebem, but rather meeting them in any place what focuer by fea or land, to helpe and fuccour them, obferuing the termes of true peace and frien Ship, according to the tenor of our Imperiall Capitulations; and that every one take heed and beware, that he do, or permit nothing to be done contrary to our will, peace, and imperiall Cipitulations. And especially you shall looks and procure all things to be observed, conformable to this our Imperiall will. And if, according to the antient custome, the King of England will eftablish there any Confull, we command, that the faid Confull, as also the Merchants, and other subjects, be accepted af fled, and protected at all times according to the intention of our Imperial Capitulation. And all of you with all your care endeauour, and deligence shall alwaies provide that the faid Nation may paffe free and fecure under our Imperiall protection and shaddow, and truffique and negotiate, buy and fell through all the parts of our Dominions to their content and full latisfaction. And if after the due of this our Imperiall Commandement we shall understand that the faid Nation be again robbed and spoiled by you, be you hereof affured, that our true flaues and subjects are those which do obey our Lawes and C Commands, and observe our will, as also it is written in our Alcaron, Obey God, the Prophet, and your Souereigne Lord : But those that doe not obey nor observe our Lawes and commandements, are not our flues nor fuljects, but rather by their difoledience do fall into our displeasure, disgrace and maled Stron. For which our Imperial Commands Shall be fent throughout all the parts of our Empire, especially to Tunes and Algier, and to all the Ports of Natolia and Gracia, and to what places somer elfe they shall come to be atwaies driven from thence, abandoned, and punished, and by all our Officers and Go. nernors per secured. Therefore take you heed that you say not hereafter you were not warned hereof before band, but give notice publikely onto all men, of the effect of this our command, and looke that you cause energ man to be obedient thereunto. By which doing you shall be bleffed of God, and obtains our fanour : for if the faid English Nation be againe troubled and molested and the King of England do fend D any forces against those transgressors to chastise and punish them, do you consider that it shall displease es. that ye are the canfe to diffurbe the peace and friendflip betweene vs. Therefore take heed and beware of all fucir actions as may any way tend to the disturbance and violating of our faid Peace and friendship. And it being our chiefest desire, that this businesse be ducly fulfilled and effected when this our Imperiall commandement (ball come unto you, and that you have performed our will therein, and fhall bane delinered into the hands of the Englishmen, all fuch men, ships, and goods as have beene taken from them; you Iball aduife vs parsicularly and punctually thereof, and in what manner you have fatisfied and contented them, and fend the fame to our Imperiall Port. And all this let be knowne unto you, gruing alwaies credit and obedience to our Imperiall Firmo.

> Written the last of the Moone Gensziel Abir, stom the departure of the Prophet 1031. Given at our Imperiall City of Constantinople.

The Capitulations or agreement of the peace made with Tunes and Algier at Constantinople, and accepted and figned by the Commissioners of Algier and Tunes.

Et infinite laud and praise be alway given to the most omnipotent God, who of his great mercy and grace hath blessed this World with peace and tranquility, for the safety and repose of his people: In conformity to whose divine will and pleasure, the most invincible and mighty Emperor hath alwaies entertained peace and amity with all those who have desi- G red his friendship, that both rich and poore, and all sorts of people might live at their ease and content, to give thankes, and serve the divine Majesty. Which most blessed peace and correspondence bath ever been observed by all the Ottoman Emperors. Therefore whereas heretofore in the happy time, of famous memory, of Sultan Morat Han now translated into Paradise (vpon whose soule let the divine mercies be multiplied) the Kings of England, according to that truth and integrity infused into them, having alwaies made demonstration of their loue and fincerity to this happy Port, then, on both sides there was concluded and established a true peace and amity, and from that time to this present have maintained their Embassadors here: And whereas there was then granted and given to the English Nation an Imperial Capitulation and priviledge (To say) That the subjects and Merchants of England, with their [bips and faculties might freely and fecurely nauigate in our feas, and traffique and nenegotiate at their owne pleasure and content in any part of the Imperial dominion: Notwithstanding some yeares past there have hapned some discontents and quarrels betweene the laid English Nation and the Souldiery of Tunes and Algier; and thereupon have succeeded diuers acts of hostility, and mutuall damages, contrary to the honour of the said Imperial Capitulation : for which cause, the mighty and famous Prince, among the Princes of the faith of Telus, obeyed of the greatest followers of the Messiah, only Gouernour of the important 1 affaires of the Nazaren Nation, Souereigne of the limits of honour and power, Lord of greatnesse and authority, the benigne and sincere friend, the glorious I A M E's King of Eneland, to whose affaires we wish all prosperity, and whose last daies may be filled with honour and felicity, bath fent to this happy and high Port his elect esteemed, and prudent Embassador Sir Thomas Rowe, Knight, with his Royall Letters; complaining vehemently against the (aid Souldiery of Algier and Tunes. The substance of robicb Letters being fignified to the Imperiall Majesty of our Emperor, he with his owne proper hand Imperial Seale bath expressely commanded, and given his Imperiall order, that the people of Algier and Tunes'y for the future should alway be obedient and observant, according to the Imperial Capitulations, and should never commit nor make she wo of any act contrary thereunto. Which Imperiall command and Edict being sent to those cities by one Mutafaraca, of the high court, and our esteemed Capigi Bassa Mahomet Aga; who arriving there, and causing the Imperial Commands to be read with a loud voice, in publique Councell, and in presence of the Beglerbegh and the whole fouldiery of the countries, every one of them with all readinesse and submission did shew themselves obedient to the said Orders and Edicts of his Imperial Majefly. But withall replied, That while we did remaine constant and firme in the Peace with the English Nation, some of their Ships, contrary to the Capitulation, league, and Frendship long since contracted on both parts, have done divers damages and injuries onto os. And whereas from cos there shall never any action proceed contrary to the said Imperial Capitulations, the said English Nation oftentimes made warre opon os; for which cause wee baue also been inforced to revenge our selves : but now our defire is, That his Imperial Maje-Sty may be truely informed of our state and cause in this businesse, and accordingly let his Majesty dispose and order us at his owne will and pleasure: for we will alwaies remaine, and be observant and obedient. To which purpose they have joyntly and with one consent, cho-Sea the wife and bonourable Lord, reverend among the prudent, the provincial Mufticalled M Seich Seidi, and the honourable and discreet, the Mufti of the City, Seich Salmi, and the two Caddees, Judges of the Provinces, two that have beene Governors, two Colonels of the army two Captaines of foot, asisted with other Antients, both Burgesses and souldiers, whom the

A bane with one confent created and established as their General Procurators and Commisioners; and in company of the said Mahomet Aga, sent to this happy Port: who being here arrived, and baving made knowne his petition to his Imperial Majesty, be and his absolute minister the Grand Visier, have expressely commanded vs, That we should call before vs the English Embassadour and the said Commissioners, and with all sincerity and justice that we should beare their differences, and make a finall and good conclusion betweene them; to wipe out all distaste and rancor, and for the time to come, to convert, and in place thereof to plans a firme and holy peace and amity. In obedience to which order, we have fent for the English B. Embassador and the said Deputies; betweene both whom, after long and litigious discourses, we, according to the expresse command of his Imperial Majesty, have declared and commanded in the name of his Imperial Majesty, to the said Commissioners of Algier and Tunes, That for the times to come they ought to obey and observe the tenour of the Imperiul Capitulations, and in this particular to conforme themselves to this Imperiall order and subsequent

That for ever hereafter, the hostility and enmity betweene them and the English should be anulled and blotted out of memory, and converted into a good peace and commerce. And after the date of this present writing, That the English Ships Small and great, merchants, and all C other subjects of England, freely and securely, at their owne will and content, shall and may passe in the seas and come not only to this our Imperial City, but also safely go to any part of our Dominion, wishout any opposition or hinderance, according to the antient vsage, and Imperial Capitulations granted in behalfe of both parties.

And that his Majesty the King of England, hereupon may give order through all the cities and ports of his Kingdomes, to publish, That from henceforth enery traveller or puffenger shall securely go in his businesse peaceably, and that they shall receive neither in their waies out ward or recurning any molestation, trouble, or impediment; but that the subjects on both D Parts shall al way observe and be obedient, conformable to the tenor of the Imperiall Capitulations made from the beginning of the peace onto this day; and that for the time to come, there may in Algier be established an English Consult, provided be be a man of quality and credie to which Confull and his Merchants, and to all his Nation and their goods, neither from those of Algier, nor from any other subjets of the Imperiall Port, shall be offered or suffered to be done, any wrong or injustice what soener; but arriving at fla Pare, the Officers of Algier (as it behooveth all strangers should be protected and cherifoed) shall receive them with all manner of courtefie and honour. And for the time to come, in case any of the English Nation should commit any act contrary to the peace, amicy, and Imperial Capitulations, for such offence the publique peace Shall not be broken, but the officers of Algier Shall certific the Same to the Confull, rebo (if it lie in his porver) shall punish any such offendor; if not, he shall then certifie bis gaufe to his Maj sty of England, or elfe to his Embaffador relident in our bapby Port to the end that the disturbers of the publike peace may be ducly punished. In conformicy robereof, if for the time to come any of the inhabitants of Algier and Tunes, shall have committed any action contrary to the Imperial Capitulations, by continuing to trouble or quarrell with the faid English Nation, the faid Confull shall make certificate and complaint to the Beglerbeghs and Commanders of the army, who shall alwaies (cuercly punish all such ma-F lefactors, to the end that those of Algier may be carefull, neuer to do any act prejudiciall to this beace and amity.

All shofe English saues which shall be found now in Algier shall be set free, who with a note or lift of their names (hall be delivered to the faid Confull at his arrivall; in exchange Hbbbbbb 2

whereof there shall be another list given runto the said Consul, of the names of divers Mussulmen taken not long since by their English ships and made slaves: which list the said Consul shall send to his Majesty of England to procure their liberty; and in this particular, of either side there shall be used no fraud or deceit.

For the time to come, all the Merchants and other English which shall arrive at Algier or Tunes, shall be received, cherished, and protected from all wrong and injury; and as in all other parts of the Empire they do safely and securely traffique and trade, so also they shall peaceably, quietly, and safely go, come, and negotiate in these cities, without any molestation, and alway they shall live according to the antient Capitulations.

That the ships of Algier and Tunes, small and great, meeting with any English ships rupon the seasor in any Ports or seale, or otherwhere, shall alway salute one another and the English shewing their Colours, that they are English and friends, there shall be no disturbance or quarrell betweene them, but all mutuall courtesse shall be shewed; and they shall do one to the other all such offices of friendship as may encrease and fortiste this good amity and correspondence: and there shall never be don any wrong or outrage one to the other sprouded that the English Ships shall not take part nor assist the enemies of the simperial Port, nor transfortin their wessels the armes or faculties of our foes, nor protest nor defend them. And if it shall happen after this conclusion, that it shall be found that any English Ship shall so carry or protest the goods of our enemies, they shall stand to their perill, and receive punishment; and yet this our accord and Peace shall remaine safe and reported the antient and Imperial Capitulations and Commands shall be preserved and obeyed.

The ceremony of the acceptation of the Peace.

The Commissioners, (to say) the two Musties, Caddees, and other aboue mentioned, mour presence made answer, That, We all in the name and behalfe of our city of Algier, and as the generall Procurators thereof, are content, and do accept of this accord and agreement, and we doe all sweare and promise to observe the same; and that for the time to come, on our parts, nor on the behalfe of our successors and posterity, there shall never any act be committed nor suffered in prejudice or disturbance of this peace and agreement. All which forestad Commissioners having before ros confessed, and sworne; the said English Embalfador did also say. In the state of my Lord and King, and as his full Procurator, do accept and receive these Canditions; and do promise, That the Subjects of his Majesty my Lord and Masses shall alway maintaine with the Subjects of his Imperials Majesty, peace, according to the antient Capitulations; and that never on our parts shall be doite any act of wrong, injury, or hostility; and at all times, when of either side there shall arise any controvuerse, or be done any injustice, that this peace shall not therefore be broken, but that the malesactors shall be sought our and duely punished.

Which declaration made on both parts, it was by is registred and published, and this our present assurance and writing given the sirst of the moneth Gemaziel, in the years of Mahomet 1932, being the middle of March 1622. Signed by the Commissioners of the Ordad Signior, deputed for the Treaty.

A Ratification of the former Treaty and, Peace sent by Sultan Morae at his afficention into the Imperial Throne.

The Commands sent to Algier and Tunes by a Capigi of the Grand Signiors, in company of Ilerug the new Bassa of Algier.

[Written by the Grand Signiors owne hand:]
In conformity hereof let it be obeyed of all my Subjects.

To the Diuan of Algier.

He Imperiall Command; To the Caddee of Algier, to all the Doctors and Churchmen, to all the Captaines of lluph; to all the Commanders, Elders, and Officers; to all the heads and Antients, and to all the Souldiery of Algier, and many slaves there inhabiting: At the arrivall of the high and Im-C periall Affirmo, you shall know; that whereas from the times of happy memory of my Grandfathers and Fathers (entred into mercy, whose Sepalchres let God glorisse) unto this day, almaies the Kings of England have with all sincerity beene in good peace and friendship with this high Port and all my Ancestors; and therefore the Imperial minde and will alwaies bath beene, That according to the Imperiaall Capitulations contracted at the first Treaty betweene both parties, That the Subjects and English Merchants might freely and securely go and come into all parts of this well governed Empire; and that they should never be troubled, hindered, nor damnified by any man, and that the faid English with all their Ships should have safe and secure passage in the sea, under the Imperial protection, and to their hearts content and quietneffe they should sollow their trades and merchandise and whereas in all times past, there was never done to them any wrong or dammage by any of our subjects: you my slaves of Algier, D or some of you, not respecting the friendship of those with whom the high Port hath peace and correspondence, do where focuer you meet their Ships, either in the Sea, or any other Port or harbor, take them and all their goods doing them many injuries & violonces, and contrary also to the Imperial Capitulations. do makes bem flaues, and many others you kill : for which your actions fo vnjust, contrary to the Impersall will and Capitulations not long fince in the time of our brother Sultan Ofman Han (now in mercy placed in Paradise) bis Majesty the King of England having sont his expresse Embassador, and his Royall Letter, admiting him of the wrongs and spoiles (focontrary to the League and peace contracted, and the Imperial will) committed by you: to the end that all you should obey, and with all diligence, care, and respect, should maintaine and observe the peace and friends in with all the friends of the high Port . that all those who had committed such actions, so contrary to the Imperial will and Capitulations, E Should be punished; the said our brother did then send you his expresse Imperial commands, signed with hu hand, which was delivered wnto you by one Mutafaraga, of the high Port, called Mahouret, whose dignity God encrease. Which commands being read in the presence of you all, every mun did answer, saying Tou were ready to obey the Order and Commands of your Lord, but that you had some particulars requifice to be prefented to the Imperial firrop, and therefore that you didelett certaine of the principall of your Country, and fent them hither to him as your Procurators : who being arrived in the time of the regiment of my honourable Vncle, and having made knowne at the foot of the Throne of his Atajeffy, all those your reasons which you had given in instruction. He gave command, that those said Commissioners, come hither in your behalfe, with the Embassador of Englandresident in our happy Port Should have a conference in the presence of my late Visier, Halil, then Captaine Baffa; and that all things F there Bouldbe accommodated and appealed. Which conference being made in the prefiribed forme, there all your grieuances were largely repeated, to the end that by reason of the about mentioned inconne. niences, there should not happen any breach of the antient Peace and friendship, all matters were then anew pacified, and by writing and new treaty accorded. That according to the antient custome there should be fent an English Consulto Algier and Tunes, and that their Merchants should safely and friendly go thither, and into all other parts of this well governed Empire, and traffique in all parts thereof, and that G they should never hereastet be any way, hindered, offended, or molefied by any, of you, and for more causion and assurance, there being written an authentical Letter sent unto the King of England, he gave or der and hath appointed a Conful with many rich merchandifes arrived in those Ports. Which my faid Vicle did also then send you his expresse Command, That you should observe all the said agreement. But now being newly aduertised, That you my slaves of Algier, who wholly contrary to the last promise, con. tract, and faith given do get, take, and Spaile the English Ships, that you meet on the Sea, robbing them of their goods, and making flaues of their men, doing them all wrong and damage; and considering the King of England is constant and sincere in his Peace and League with vs, and that the protection and cherishing of his subjects is necessary unto us; and that for you of Algier, or other of my Beghs wholeucr, to take vessels, goods, or men from the said English nation, so contrary to the last agreement made, H and faith given, is a thing much against our will und the imperial Capitalations by us granted; and alfo it being our will, that betweene you and them there fould be ag ood peace and correspondency, and that the faid English Nation may fafely and securely traffique in all parts of this our well governed Empire. and that no man presume to do them any dammage or injury, and that for the time to come the tenour of our Imperiall Capitulations in their Land maying duely observed, we have sent youthis our Imperial Command, and We do command you.

That enery one of you, of what condition soener, do abey according to the tenour of thu my Imperial Command, fent you on purpose for this only reason; That whether by sea, or in any other place where you Thall meet any Ship of the English their people or goods, you do unto them no violence or wrong whate. ener . But alway according to the Capitulations given them, and the last treaty and agreement made with you, that you hold and keepe a true peace and friendship with them; and also that you obey according to the commandements formerly sent to you in this businesse; and that you never do nor suffer to be done any act contrary unto them, but that you with all diligence observe and obey this my Command lent you. in doing whereof you shall obtaine our favour and benediction. And seeing according to the agreement made betweene you, there were divers flaves fet free and fent with you from England, you also fall fet free all those English states that shall be found in your hands, and shall consigne them to the English Confull. And that whereas the Ship of England which was fent winto you with divers English goods, baning beene discharged, and receiving your safe conduct, and returning to their Country, being mer by Some of Algier, who had no reflect to the accord and faith ginen, they did take both the Ship and goods. and make the men saues: therefore that att being very contrary to our louing peace and friendship, you shall deliner the said Ship and goods and men to the English Consult and take beed you do not herein shew disobedience to our Command, and that those whosever, who have been so bold to commit such an offence so contrary to the Peace and faith given, you shall cause to be severely punished. In conclusion, know you, that in no case it is our Imperial will, that the said English A ation hereafter shall be any may troubled or damnified, (o contrary to our Imperiall Capitulation. Therefore let enery one of you be admonished, That according as it is written in our Law, saying, Obey the Lord God, the Prophet, and the Emperor , that thereby obeying you Shall obtaine my blesting , you shall never consent nor permit that any thing be done contrary to my Imperiall will: for if hereafter it hall be made knowne with us, that the faid English Nation shall be againe outraged and injuried by you, be affored that everyone of you shall fall into my indignation and disgrace, and you shall bee punished with all severity. Therefore be you advertised, that the obeying of my Imperial Command shall be unto you an assurance and ornament both of glory and felicity, and having my benediction, every one of you undoubtedly shall assunt happine fe in this World, and glory in the World to come, and you fhall enjoy all your deferts. Then you my flaues of Algier, according to the tenor of this my command fent you, be you friends with the English sincerely and perfectly, and doe you entirely observe the Peace and League, and We kindely the English Confull among you and protect and defend their Mexchants, and whether by Sea or in Port you had meet any of their Ships hew unto them all friendship, and omit no occasion to aid, defend, and to som lone unto them : and this our Imperiall Command both of the arrivall and in what fort you have accepted and obeyedit, and in what forme you have established the Peace, and resented my will and command, you hall aduise the whole by your answer unto our high Port. And then let it be knowne winto you, gining alast credit unto our Imperiall Signature.

To the Bassa of Algier.

He High and Imperiall Affirmo being arrived, you shall know, Whereas in times past the Gouernorus in that Province before you, by receiving the fifths and tenths of the hips, goods, and men, which the Souldiery of Algier did take and rob from the English Nation and by giving them leave and authority to do such depredations and acts. so contrary to the Imperiall Capitulations, the faid fouldiery have taken so much boldnesse and daring, that they continue to do innumerable spoiles and violences conto the said English Nation: which their insolent actions being made knowns winto the high Port, and there was instantly written and fent unto them expresse and Imperiall Commands, That in no year, nor by no meanes it was not the will nor the Imperial minde, that the Gouernours (bould in such fort conniue, and so euidently (contrary to the Imperiall Capitulation) (bould take any fifths or tenths, nor give nor permit any licence onto the faid fouldiers, to do so injust things; but that in this particular they should all do their diligence of love, and that they should never take any fifths or tenths of the goods of the faid English, stollen by the faid souldiers, nor that they should permit poon no pretence, that the English ships, goods, and men, so contrary to the Imperial Capitulations. should be neither by them nor any other journaged, molested, or damnified; and that if hereafter it should be knowne, that the faid Governours should not with standing anew bave taken and accepted the fifths and tenths of the ships, goods, or Englishmen, rubbed and taken by the [aid Souldiery, and because they have consented and suffered the Soulaiery to doe such depredations, wrong, and spoiles, and for having also beene the cause to violate the Peace, League, and friendship betweene us and the King of England; that as faulty and guilty men they should be condignely punished. Now being that we are anew informed, That the Souldiers do not obey the faid Commands and Orders fent by cos, and that by you the Gouernors there is D leave given them to continue in their infull course of rubbery and oppression, and that still you do take the said fifths and tenths, and that you proceed in violating of the Imperiall Capitulations; Know you, That you are fallen into a diffrace, being it is in no fort our Imperiall will, that the said English Nation should be so damnified and outraged. And to the end that all the Commands given and lent into those parts for this businesse, may be observed and obeyed, and that hereafter by no meanes there may never be given nor permitted any liberty to the said Souldiers to do the like depredations woon the said Nation, and that never you nor any after you, do never take any fifth nor tenth, nor any part, but that alway the faid Nation fould be protected and defended, We have given this our Imperial Chmmandement, and we do command.

That when this shall be arrived, you shall observe and do according to this our high and Imperiall Command; onely given for this reason, and also in conformity of the former Commands sent in this businesse: which you shall obey with all diligence and care; and that you shall never take nor accept any sifth nor other share, of the ships, goods, or men, that the Souldiers of Algiers shall so unjusty take (contrary to our Imperiall Capitulations) from the said English Nation: nor never hereafter shall give leave, nor suffer, that the Souldiers, so contrary to my will and Imperiall Capitulations, shall doe such spoiles and depredations to the said English Nation; and that in no case you shall never permit that Englushmen shall be there sold, but you shall alway protect and defend them. And know of certainty, That if after the arrivall of this our Command, we shall understand, that the said Nation shall be anew outraged and injuried, no excuse from you shall be accepted nor heard; and not only you shall be deprived of your government, but you shall be severely punished. Therefore be advised, and take heed G that you commit no act that shall be contrary to my will and Imperial Capitulations given to the faid Nation. And in conclusion, take you order that all my slaves of Algier may keepepeace and friendship with the said English; because it is my Imperial defire, that the said Nation and their Merchants may come go, and traffike in all parts of our Empire. Therefore do you do all your diligence and endeauour, and to see that the Peace be setled with the said English. and take heed that you commit no negligence nor errour Phatsoever. And thus be it knowne conto you, gining alway faith to our Imperiall Signature.

The like three feuerall Commands, only fome circumstances altered, according to the requisites of the place, were written and sent to the Dye, and Bassa, and Dinan of Tunes.

This Peace thus concluded and promulged, was well and exactly observed for fine yeares, and not one English ship assailed or taken, and at last fix hundred Mariners, subjects of his Majesty, released from a miserable seruitude and captinity; vntill a small offener was done to them, which they eafily apprehended, to renew their defire of spoyle, by which onely they live, as being a people without industry or traffique; there being but one way to maintaine a Prace with them who are glad of any occasion of warre, not to begin, nor to vabiade their hands; for the foule of Wisedome is Prevention. And so we proceed to our generall

Ali Baffà the

On the foure and twentieth of March Ali Bassa the great Visier, by whose meanes Sultan Morat was advanced to the Crowne, was sent for into the Seraglio; where being questioned by the young Emperor about the affaires of the Persian inuasion, he was condemned instantly to lose his head, which was executed in the place, and his body throwne out naked into the streets. The occasion of his sudden death was attributed to his dissimulation with the Grand Signior in the loffeof Babylon, that he had suborned false aduice that there was no fuch matter; either for floath, or feare to take vpon him the charge of the war, with anarmy that would not obey in the city: and the base mony which he had caused to be coyned, being but one fift filuer, with which he made a whole payment to the Souldiery, putting the good K dollars into his owne purse. But indeed the true cause was his owne sordid couetousnesse, who in fix moneths had heaped up an infinite treasure, by sale of all Iustice and Offices; which in the end weighed him downe to the ground, and supplied (like a large spunge) their present wants for the intended war in Asia. To this dignity was aduanced Cerques Meebemet Buffa, an antient Visier, a man of an honest and sincere nature, and one too good for those times; who after he had enjoyed his place but a short while, laboured to surrender it, as was ble to support or content the infolency of the Spahies in their unreasonable demands of impossible benefits. In the meane time the preparation for the warre in Asia was advanced, though the resolution to set sorward was deserted, upon hope that by the authority of Cherques Mehemet Baffa and other new Ministers, Abaffa Baffa might be reduced to obedience, and L that great feare and impediment removed; they having undertaken to endeauour it, though it appeared very difficult, being that he yet continued the fiege of the castle of Angria; and that his scattered army that wintered abroad, begun to returne to him from all parts, it was judged h. would be loth (although the Grand Signior had fent him another) to trust his life vpon a pardon.

The Emperor

While the Grand Signior was thus threatened in Asia with the King of Persia and his owne Rebell sibassa Bassa, the Emperor of Germany made great preparations for Hungary, to the number of fifty thousand men, which bred great jealousie at the Port: But his Embassador the Baron of Curcy, lately arrived, to preuent a generall breach, and the expiration of the last Treaty made for twenty yeares at Zitwar, in the yeare 1606, diffembling all the aids gi. M uen to Gaber, gaue the Grand Signior full affurance, that his Master had no intent of breach with him; but openly diffauowed the Truce with the Prince of Transyluania, made at Goding and that Cefar would make war vpon him, vnleffe he might haue all the places in Hungary in Gabors poffession restored; desiring only a neutrality from the Port, according to the

A antient Treaty. The Prince of Transylvania, who now repented that he had given away the vie of his late victorie which he might have enjoyed, and forefeeing the storme that was like to fall voon him, tent to the Port for fuccors: who with much ado obtained fome Tartars, and Commands to the Bassa's of Bosna, Buda, Caniza, Agria, and Temizuar, to be ready with all their frontier garrifons to defend and affift him in any motion of the Emperor, or elfe not to flirre:being vnwilling to abandon him, who was then their chiefest bulwarke toward that part of Christendom, whilst most of their forces should be employed against the Persian in Asia. who had then entred Diarbech, the antient Mesopotamia, and taken Misbin and Merdin, two principall places, and all that prounce, except Hamit the chiefe city, wherin was a Baffawho defended the fame with great valor and reputation and it was not then known where the Perfian would limit his ambition, many other parts fearing him for that which he had alreadic done: for he had separated the Arabia's, and all to the East of the Persian sea, from the Turkish empire: as having conquered from Balfara Northward, almost all to his own Derbent your the Caspian sea.

Vpon the 18 of April the Victuallers for the Asian army passed over the water, but the dispatch of the Vizier and the army was still detailed, and little speech when they should depart. In the mean time the Persian prevailed, without any opposition of consequence: & no man could differn the inward cause of this flownesse, only the outward appearance was, a suspition and complaint from the Black sea, the City of Cassa having sent their Musti & other Commissioners to inform the grand Signior, That 400 boats of Cossacks were abroad. That C they had done great spoiles in the coalt of Tartaria and the Turkish Empire, and taken many thips laden with prouision for the Port; and forty thousand more armed and horsed, ready for fome land attempt; which put all those parts into great fear, of which they defired that prefent care and prouision might be taken and ordered for their desence. Whereupon there was held a new Councel, and Ibrahim Baffa dispatched with thirteen gallies, to make gard til more aids could be prepared sintending not long after to fend a land army, and the Captain Baffa with their whole fleet.

Abaffa Baffa (the supposed rebell of Asia) having collected his Army together, suddenly role from Angria, and departed Eastward, having done no spoile to the city nor inhabitants, but left behinde him a better fame than any Gouernour tent from the Port: he now accepted of the grand Signiors pardon, and in obedience to his command, and thew of his fubmillion, marched directly towards Diarbecher, to unite himfelfe with Hafis Achmet Raff , as was supposed for the desence of that Countrey, who onely made some head against the Persian. This resolution of his departure did much service to that State, for th. reby the Ianizaries & Spahies were accorded, and incouraged to goe to the Warre, who before could not be drawn out, fuspecting one another, and fearing Him more than the common enemy. For it was evident, if he had staid in the way, either the fouldiers would neuer haue gone out, or beene subject to delay, mutinies, and diffentions, by reason of their factions. But now upon this good fortune to the State, the great Vizier, Treasurer, Aga of the Ianizaries, and all the Officers and Army were passed ouer to Scutari, and mustered the tenth of May, beeing ordained to march the twentieth; which was expected with great longing, in respect of the Souldierie, who as yet behaued themselues soberly, and made shew of reformation and obedience to Laws. They were all about 30000 Ianizaries and 40000 Spahies, many being gon before to make the army compleat, and the place of their rendevous about Brussia.

In the mean time a report was fored, that the king of Persia was dead; but that gained little credit with the Turks, who knew it to be a vival policie of that King, in hope therby to flacken the hast of their forces sent against him ; but it did rather quicken them, insomuch that they

Biram Baffa was dispatched General of the frontier of Poland & Bugdania, with four thou. fand foldiers, and order to draw together and command al the Beghs and garifons, and to raife F forces in that quarter, in preuention of some attempt seared from the Cossackes, who were in arms vpon the border, and had put all into distraction. To the 13 gallies before mentioned, to make a gard in the Black sea, were added ten more; who first transported lean Gheray Han to re-establish him Prince of the Tarears, and depose Mechmet advanced the year before. That resolution resolution was caried very secretly, and though there was some whisper, yet he was not decla. G red until the day he kissed the grand Signiors Vest, took his leave, mounted his gally, & de. parted. The cause of this sudden mutation was pretended, That Mechmet was accused by the Poles to haue broken the peace, and so they would pacific the Cossackes on better hopes: but the truth was, he was suspected, because he had excused to send aid to the Asian War, being the truth was, he was large the entry of the Cossacks into his country; and the rather, because his brother Shachin Gheray, who fled twelue years before to the Persian, being in disgrace with Achmat, was now returned into Tartaria, at the instant when the Persian did inuade the Turks dominions, as if there had bin some confederacie between them, both those brethren beeing braue foldiers: and therfore it was feared that a dangerous reuolt or war would breakeout in those parts, for if Mechaet were not suddenly surprised, it was thought he would defend him. H felf and his possession. When the Gallies had performed their service to the new prince, they were appointed to join with the others, and to discharge Ibrabim Bassa; one Huzein Bassa Vizier of the Bench being fent to that command: Biram Bassa having likewise order to have an eye vpon the Tartars, as well as on the Poles. At the first departure of the first gallies, as foone as they came into the Blacke sea they met with a small Carmifal, who reporting, That only forty boats of the Cossacks were before them, the Ianizaries mutined, and forced their General to retire into the chanel, and demanded more strength; who were supplied with more

The Pyrats of Tunes and Al-

Among & other distractions and revolts of the subjects of that Empire, the pyrats of Al-Tunes and Alagier in rebellion gier and Tunes cast off all obedience, not only upon the sea, where they were masters, but pre- I fuming to do many insolencies vpon the land, and in the Grand Signiors best ports. They began at Rhodes, where the castle shot at them. Afterward, a fleet of six pyrats of Tunes met with a Flemish ship called the Moon, laden at Alexandria; with whom notwith standing their peace, they fought and fired her, not fauing any thing but fome of the men, whom they made flaues; and after comming into the port of Salines at Cyprus, they found two Flemings more, and two Venetians, able to fight with two such fleets. As soone as they came into the Road, they now claimed peace of the Flemings, seeing themselves too weake to see vpon all source; protesting, That if they would affift their enemies, the breach was on their parts: who therupon vnworthily promised a neutralitie. Then they set vpon the Venetians, the captains where of went ashore to craue protection of the Castle in the graund Signiors port; for which the g Begh demanded fifty thousand Dollars, or else they should take their fortune. Which they refused, and so were exposed to their own desence, and the pyrats beginning with the smale fer ship, she made a good resistance, but having no help, she was thrice fired, and at last burnt tot he water. The Captaine of the Dolphine (the greater ship) not shooting a shoot, with his men stole ashore and fired her, being a Vessell of eight hundred tunnes, and armed with forty eight braffe pieces. The ladings of these two were valued at 300000 dollars, of which the Pyrats faued nothing: & in cuils it was a bleffing that such a ship fel not into their hands, seeing the Cowards were not able to hold so strong a fort. From thence they sailed to Scandaron, where finding another Fleming and a Polacra, they surprised both, and then prepared to land. The Aga of the Scale and all the inhabitants fled, and they facked the L town, and robbed all ware-houses: and not therwith content, they set it on fire, so that nothing remained but stone walls, that would not burn. The greatest losse to strangers fell vpon the Dutch and English, for the former lost about thirty thousand, and the later about ten thoufand dollars; and fo they reigned in the port eight daies and departed. An infolencie volufferable, if that State had any sence of honor or profit: for by this example there was no Scale of the grand Signior seure, and all trade must be given over, if no present course were taken

Vpon the last of May, after long expectation, the great Vizier Cerques Mehemet Bassand the Army for Asia began to march: and Abassa Bassa had made so many halts on the way, that he was greatly suspected of the Ianizaries, that he lingred vpon purpose for them; and at the M best it was scared, that he would onely returne to Arzitum and keepe the same. The Persians death was no more spoken of, but it was rather doubted hee would be found aliue suddenly neer Aleppo: and the Emir of Sidon did once more threaten Damascus and Ierusalem. Thus the mischiefs and seares of that State followed one another like claps of thunder: For Mech. Troubles in met Gheray, made Tartar Han the yeare before, being encouraged by his brother Shachim. Tartary. newly come from his banishment in Persia, would not submit to the Grand Signiors Order, and refigne his Principalitie to his Cousin Iean Gheray (not long after sent and made Prince) and therefore he was againe recalled, fearing to put that countrey to trouble. But before that Order could ouertake him, hee was landed, and Mechnes Gheray came downe with a great army to refifthim; and the Generall of the gallies in the Blacke Sea was forced to land both his lanizaries and Artillerie for his defence, and with such power as they could make (not exceeding foure thousand) to entrench them under the countenance of their Ordnance, whence there passed sharpe blowes in three skirmishes, and on both sides about B two thousand slaine; the Generall dispatching one galley to the Port with advice, and requiring present succours. Whereupon the eleventh of June a peremptorie Order came from the Grand Signior, That seeing his honour was now ingaged, hee would maintaine Ican Gheray, and give him speedy ayds. To which end a Councell was held the same day, and resolution taken to send supplies, either the Captaine Bassa, who was then ready for the Mediterran, or by order to the Princes of Bugdania and Wallachia. And those brothers, then in possession, had no retreit, but must maintaine their disobedience by the sword, which was a matter of as much danger as euer befell the Turkish Empire. Hereupon the Captain Bassa with fixteene gallies went into the Blacke Sca in ayd of Ican Gheray, made Prince of the Tartars, whom Mechmet Gheray had beaten off the land, and forced him to retire to the Grand C Signiors gallies that carried him thither. The Emperour being still resoluted to give those people a Prince, ordered all the frontier fuccours to meet him to place him by force; which was, in the opinion of many that knew the countrey, held a matter of great difficultie, all the Tarcars taking pare with Mechmet, who had in his army neere threefcore and ten thousand

In the mean time the great Vizier Cerques Mehmet Baffa marched towards Dierbecker, from whence there was news, That the Arabs, joyned with fome of the Grand Segniors forces had given a checque to the Persian: which did encourage their owne army, who were not yet out of feare of Aballa Balla and his troupes (that flayed about Kelarie) carnelly expecting what part he would take. Yet the feason being hot, the Persian advanced little but onely forraged D the countrey.

Voon the ninth of July, betweene seventy and sourcescore boats of the Cossackes, with The cossack fifty men apeece (rowers and fouldiers) watching the opportunitie of the Captaine Baffa's source being ingaged in Tartarie, entred the Bofphorus about breake of the day, where dividing being themselves, they sackt and burnt almost all the villages and houses of pleasure on both sides the River, as farre as the Castles, and within foure miles of Constantinople. The principall places were Bingdary and Jenicoie, on the Grecian; and Stenia on the Affatick shore: where having made great and rich booty, they stayed untill nine of the clocke in the forenoone: and then all the City having taken the alarme, the Grand Signior came downe to the water fide, the Chimacham to the water Port : Halil Baffa made himselfe Generall in this tumult. E and having not one galley ready for defence, hee caused to be manned and armed all the shipboars, barges, and other small wherries, to the number of source or fine hundred, with such people, as they could either get to row, or hope to fight; and dispatched all the horse and foot in the city, to the number of ten thousand, to defend the coast from further spoyle. Nouerwas there feen a greater feare and confusion for the time : yet they expected that those poore Theeues would voon their preparation presently retyre. But they seeing the Turks boats make towards them, drew themselves together into the middest of the channell, not farre aboue the Castles, and stayed firme vpon their Oares in battalion (in forme of a Crescent) expecting the affault, the wind and current being against them. Halil Baffa caused some that to bee made afarre off, but they answered not with one musket, onely houcred from one shore to another, without any shew of retreit. Hereupon, the Generall seeing their forme and resolution, thought it not fit to assaile them with such boars as hee had, but esteemed it wisedome enough to keepe them from surther attempts; searing if they had broken his fleet of boats, which was easily done, that they would venture downe to Constantinople, which was now empty of all defence. And thus these few Rouers having first made great spoile, lay Iiiiii 2

thewholeday vntil Sun, set, facing and brauing that great and formidable city of the World, G and all the force it could make, and departed with their booty, with their Colours spred, up-

This small action and bold attempt to affront so great an Empire, made a strange discoverie, how much under the reputation the terror and strength of the state was then, how weake and unprouided they were. But as the Oracle commanded them, first to seat over against blind men, it hath bin their fortune euer to haue blind enemies. Philip of Macedon had ne. uer projected, nor his son Alexander neuer adventured with so small forces, the large enterprise of subduing the Eastern Empire, if they had not discouered the effeminate and raint courage of the Asiatiques, by the admirable retreit of Xenophon, & swift incursion of Agestlam. Great armies not daring to oppose the vertue of their small numbers. So we see, of small beginnings H oftentimes great matters do arise; for by this attempt of the Cossackes the Poles had absolutely broken the peace with that Empire.

Huzein Baffa that had beene twice great Visier, and voon the tumult of the Souldieriehad transled in the made an escape the yeare before (a man turbulent and hated of all men) beeing at last taken and carried into the Seraglio; after bee had (by many faire promises) confessed and restored much of the treasure carried away by him, was strangled in the Court, and had the inst reward of his tyrannie. And the present great Visier, sent to make head against the Persan, did yet flay at Iconium, expecting the Soldierie, who did flowly draw to him: fother it was thought he would Winter in Aleppo, being not able to proceed in the war that summer.

The Captain Bassa, sent into the Black sea, to establish Jean Gheray Prince of the Tattare, I was forced to retyre to Caffa, being repulsed from the land; the people retaining Mechania possession. Wherupon, to cure the wound with as little skar as was possible, he in the Grand Signiors name was constrained to confirme the other, and to be content to accept a curtesie, for which he gaue small thanks. And Cante-Emir-Emirze having again entred Poland, & done fome spoil by the cutting down of some woods, was intercepted in his retreit, and routed with the loffe of two thirds of his Army : and the Poles with a very great Campe intrenched neer Chotyn (the fort besieged by Sultan Ofman in the late war, & surrendred vpon the peac.) expecting the cuent of the great troubles on that fide.

The Coffactes returne to the Befphorus.

The Coffackes after their first retreit returned again to the mouth of the Bosphorus, with double the number of their first fleet, being an hundred and fifty boats at the least, the supply K having lurked behind, either for succour in case of need, or for some other advantage. They stated off and on upon the coast three daies more, burnt the Pharos, and some two or three villages. They threatened to come to the Arfenall, putting all the City in great confusion. Gards were continued and re-inforced in all parts upon the land; and at last two Gallies, filled with porters and labouring men taken up in the streets, and about twenty boats, were fent out to keep watch, where they remained at the entrance of the Channels. But the Cossacks with their great booty, and two or three Carmifals taken, retyred; and fo the feare was past for that time. But some of the poore Cossacks beeing taken firagling too far you the land, confessed upon examination, that Mechmet Prince of the Tartars was confederat with them in this attempt, in reuenge of the offer made to displace him. And this consession hastened L the death of HuZein Baffa, who in the time of his government of a prisoner made Authors a Prince, and gaue libertie to the Lords of Poland that were prisoners at the Port, Cofwhom mention hath bin made before) and dispeeded suddenly the Duke of Sparasky, who if they had then bin there, without doubt they had been kept hoftages a for in this tumult the Agent *Lieutenant to of Poland ranne fome hasard, if by the wildome of the "Chimacham it had not bin pre-

About the four and twentieth of July the Prince of Transylvania made an absolute Peace with the Emperor, without the knowledge or watrant of the Port. Which caused great su fpition among them, but they bate it both filently and patiently, in respect of their own troubles then in Asia and other places, Therefore the Prince kept the conditions the more secrets M how foeuer, it was known that he furrendred and disclaimed all title to Hungary, and conferted that the Emperors fon should be presently chosen King thereof, and keepe his Court at Presburg: That all the Estates of Hungary should receive him, and the prince of Transilvania affift and ferue him in all his occasions: That Bethlem Gaber should remain quietly prince of Transylvania, and Earle of the Siculi: That he should hold Cassovia, & two or three other Signiories which he formerly possessed, during life; and after, that they should returne abso--lutely as members to the Crown of Hungary. And this article did trouble the grand Signior. That the Prince at all had mentioned Transylvania without any relation to him, as if that prouince had depended of the Empire. Some other articles there were concerning the effaces sof privat men, and mutuall pardons; this which hath bin fet downe is the substance of the Treaty.

In the mean time & Chiaus Gent by the grand Signior to the Emperor, with newes of his inauguration, and to offer the continuance of the antient leagues and treaties between them) seturned to the Port with the Emperors letter of acceptance, and confirmation of the Treaty n made at Zitwa, which was the laft: wherein it was agreed, That what either fide poneffed at that time should remain as it was; and if any road should be made, and prisoners taken, or places surprised during the truce, on either part, that restitution and full satisfaction should bee winen by him that innonated. Ali Baffa the Visier before, and Cerques Baffa at that prefent, did both of them consent to the renuing of this treaty, which was often broken: ignorant veterly of the affaires of those parts, and of the disaduantage to the prince of Transylvania and their own State: for herby the Truce being again in vigor, the grand Signior was bound to furrender Vatz, and many other places of importance, which had bin surprised in a time when there was neither absolute peace nor war between them, and was obliged to make many other restitutions of damage. But the Imperial party did not presse those smaller matters, only demanding Vatz, with all the country depending, held themselves for their limits, strictly vnto that treaty, which was then again confirmed on both fides. This conclusion discontented many, who laid the blame on the information of the Bassa of Buda, a suspected pentioner of the emperor: but it was the grand Signiors troubles in Asia that made him filent, and fuffer both that loffe and many affronts from Tartary and the Coffacks.

There arrived in the mean time from the Black fea two gallies, which brought the bodies Moretofibe of two Visiers, and certain newes of the ouerthrow of the Army, fent under the command of arithrowns by the Captaine Baffa to plant the new prince of the Tartars: who having landed his forces and the Tartars. artillery, was routed and beaten, himfelfe wounded, twenty eight pieces of Ordnance loft, two

Visiers of the Bench, and about five thousand soldiers slain and taken, the rest sauced by slight

D. vpon the Gallies ; onely the Captaine Bassa with his fleet staied about Varna to receive new order. There had not happened to that Empire in many Ages a losse of more importance in respect of the consequences; An Imperiall Army beaten, and thereby Tattaria separated from obedience to the Turkith Empire, and that people taught to know, That they were able to make and maintaine their owne Prince, But this was no time to take too much knowledge of that differece: Policie teaching them, rather to cure, than to make the breach greater. For the grand Signior after that, dispatched a galley to the Prince of the Tartars, with a Vest, and & Sword for his sonne, and a confirmation to him of his place. Casting all the faults youn the Captaine Baffa, and difavowing his attempts; though hee was fent with Commission to do it. Which (to make the dissimulation good) was like to cost him his head, being sent for in to answer the same. The sudden yeelding on the grand Signiors part showed a great weakheffe and feare, to flatter a victorious enemy; and it was doubted how the Tarrarian would accept a gift which he had gotten by his own ftrength; for if he flood out hee would proue a dangerous neighbor, the city of Constantinople being alwaies open to him; for Adrianople and the borders did then fear him, and even some Cossacks did toyne with him, although before they had been mortall enemies. Yet to make fome compensation of this defeation, A-Gaffa Baffa the strong rebell had made his peace with the great Visier in Asia; and to seale the Gredit of his faith by another trecherle, fent in the heads and estates of three of his chief followers to redeem his own. Which much raifed the dul countenance of that Court : for although the pardon was diffionourable, yet was it leafonable. But they durft not joyne their

Armies for fear of new flirres, for he went toward his own gouernment of Arzirum, with promise to keep it safe; and the Visier marched slowly towards Babylon, as then held by the

Abassa Bassa in Kaiserie (neer thereunto) he was ernestly prouoked by the Ianizaries to set vp. G on him. But the Visier having expresse order, not to make the breach greater with the rebel, but tovse all means to appeale him and to reconcile him to them, would not be drawn to confent therunto: for which cause, and some other their small discontents, they twice stoned the tents of the Visier, and wounded him in the head. Wherupon hee affembled the Comman. ders of the Spahies, declaring voto them the great trust the grand Signior had in them; and thewing them an absolute Order given him to keepe good tearmes with abassa, and never to fall to blowes with him, he defired them to finde some way of pacification betweenehim and the Ianizaries: who instantly promised their obedience and aid to execute all his commands. Then the Visier called together some of the Captaines of the Ianizaries, and persuaded them to to worke with their companions, that a peace might bee concluded betweene H them and a bassa Bassa. Who finding their fellowes very vnwilling, had much adoe to perfuade them: in the end it was agreed, that the Visier should treat and accommodate all differences. Who prefently fent to conferre with Abassa Bassa; but he by no means would trust Aballa reconcihimselfe, or give a meeting, and answered, That hee would never depart from his Followers and Army, but if he defired to fpeake with him in private, that he should first fend his bro. ther the Beglerbeghof Caramania, and Eliza Baffa of Natolia in hoftages, and that then he would come ento him. Which diffidence of his much displeased, and the Visier was confrained to treat the peace by mediation. Which having at the last brought to effect, he took his oath three times upon the Alcaron, To hold him as a friend, and neuer to doehim any violence. The lanizaries also gaue their consent in publique, promising to maintaine the I word of the Visier : and the articles of their reconciliation being drawn in writing, were sent to Abiffa, who reciprocally made the like oath, and accepted the peace vpon the conditions following, figned by the Visier: That he should be confirmed Basia of Arzirum, his son Beg. lerbegh of Orfa, and his Lieutenant of Maras (all on the borders of Perfia) and that he should depart with all his army to the defence and custodie of that province, and wait vpon the aduantages of the Enemy.

While Abaffa Baffa did treat this accommodation, Colophon Mustapha Baffa (the principal of his Colleagues in all his rebellion) made some shew of retyrednesse from him, and vaderhand to parle with the Visier apart; and in conclusion wrot vnto him, and promised to deliver or to kill Abassa Bassa. Which Letters of his being either intercepted or sent him, and see g ing that Colophon had refolued to kil him treacheroully, he called him into his tent, and asked him plainly, Why he went about to betray him; and withall thewing him his own hand; hee drew his sword and claue his head, deliuering all his goods to some servants of the Visier, to configne vnto their master. Then it was anew moued to Abassa Bassa, That he should advance with his forces presently towards Babylon, against the Persian, who had retired his main Army to oppose the princes of V sbecke, who had made some incursion; leaving five thousand garrison souldiers in the city. But Abassa refused to go, vrging, That hee was onely bound by the Treaty to returne and make gard in his gouernment of Arzirum. Whereupon the Viller, forced to arife and advance, he arrived at a castle called Nigda (neere Aleppo) wherein were diucrs chiefe followers of Abaffa Baffa; who having understood of the Pacification made, L came out with presents and victuals to meet the Visier and his Army, and were of him well received. But the Ianizaries enuying to see them so well vsed and honoured, in a fury fellypon them and killed them all; and vling the opportunitie, entred the Castle, put to execution their wives and children, and every person found therin, and all others that could be discovered in the bordring villages appearaining to him, to the great discontent of the Visier. Which being known to Abassa, and seeing they had broken their oath and faith, he rose with his Army, and marched right to the Imperial camp; where arriving, one of his captains with 400 horse began the dance, and without delay fell into the Quarter of the Ianizaries, doing some execution for an hour and half, in which skirmish there fell on both sides two or three thoufand. The Visier seeing this beginning, partly forced by the Ianizaries, and partly for his ho- M nor, drew up his whole army to come to a battell in their defence. Which Abaffa Baffa perceiuing, and that which hee expected not (who hoped that the Vizier & Spahies would have giuenhim leaue to reuenge many injuries upon the faith-breakers) unwilling to fight with the grand Signiors General founded a retreat, and got himself and his army a mile or two distance off. The Vizier to show himselfe faithfull to the Ianizaries, and to keepe in grace with them, sent four Beglerbeghs with their regiments in pursuit of him, who finding Abassa Bassa and his army in good order and firm, made some shew of skirmish to little purpose. But they returned to the campe, and told the Vizier, that they had found him in battalion with 40000 men, and that they were not able to deale with him. The next day Abiffa with many great threatrings marched away directly for Arzirum; and the Visier to Diarbecher, for his hybernation, in great displeasure of the lamizaries, and the rather for that he was belowed and pro-

The brother of Mechmes Gheray in the mean time brake through the province of Bugdania The Tarters (Radula the Vayuod having made escape) and entred into Poland, first spoiling the country, make author-and driving away all the carrelland afterward entred Wallachia, and halianed his formation. and driving away all the cattel; and afterward entred Wallachia, and befreged his fon prince lind. of that country, in his castle of Tergovista, notwithstanding they were subjects of the graund Signior. And in fled of sending back the attillery loft in the last deseat (which was expected) he entred the castle of Caffa, the chief port of the Negropont, and carried away from thence all the cannon and munition, which he tooke vp into the land to his town of Bagehaiferay, as if he meant to fortifie himselse, a practise at that time viknown to the Tartars. Which were ill fignes of fubmission, & yet the name of Musfulmen, at any time when they come to blows doth easily accommodate all quarrels.

About the 12 of March following, the Tartar Hansent an Embassador to the Port, with an Tartar line offer of his Masters service, which was received with great joy; excusing the entry of the Tar. Indian imtars into the frontier of the Turkish empire, as being don in the service of the grand Signior, the last. only to fetch Cante. Emir. Emirze and his followers out of Silistria, and to compet them to retyre, to avoid and take away all occasion from the Poles to lament the injuries donby them; that therby they also might take the like order for their Cossacks, and so the peace might be duly observed on both sides. Whereupon a post was dispatched into Poland, admissing what was done, and requiring that on both parts the like correspondence might be observed; or els that the grand Signior would understand, if the Cossackes made any new attempt, that the peace was broken on that fide, being they could have no excuse to lay the fault upon the Tartars. This viewas made of the Embassage : yet the Vizier was not without jealousic of the D finceritie of the messenger, but thought he was sent for exploration, to discouer the force, preparation and refolution of that State; and therefore they made all fliew of good prouition, arms being given out to the Bostangies, and a great sleet dressing for the black sea, wherin the Cossacks had bin already feen, and rumor made them to exceed 300 boats: infomuch that all the inhabitants of the Bosphorus did daily retyre to Constantinople. The sear was generall. which was fufficient argument of weaknesse; and the year before had shewed what might be don with a small and resolute force.

Now that the feafon ferued, the Persian prepared to continue the invasion, and the Vizier to oppose him. All the Soldierie departed towards the campe, though they intended not to E meet, but to makewar by diversion. Abassa got some credit at the Port, and they casily apprehended all occasion to beleeue his reconciliation. One of the chief commanders in the Perfian army fent to Abassa, to persuade him to deliuer Arzirum his gouernment to the Shar which he seemingly accepted, and trained him on with 8000 men to take possession, when in the mean time he drew together his troupes, and suddenly sent them under the conduct of a prince of Georgia, and set vpon them, who suspected no such treason, routed them, and slew a thousand, whose heads he divided and sent for presents to the Port and the camp. V pon which action, by the multitude he was proclaimed to be the best subject of the graund Signior, and named to be Vizier. But some thought it not so great an affurance of his sidelitie, because he went not in person, nor would come out of his strength, though commanded to draw into the field to affift in the generall fetuice : excusing himselfe vpon the necessitie of defending the frontier. Neither could be refuse to fend some of his followers to this exploit (being viged thereo by some of his Captains) without discouering himself too soon; his resolution vadoubtedly being, That while those two great Opposits strong for the whole, he would keepea part of Asia, and his own head; knowing that hee could make his peace with the furrender to the G Conqueror, at pleasure.

From these parts were not the greatest nor neerest feares: for the Prince of the Tattars ha. ning made peace with the Poles, and taken the Coffackes into his fellowship, made shew of fome defigne against the Turkish Empire; and the people were indifferent, many inclining to him. The Coffackes with three hundred Frigots croffed the Black fea, facked and burnt the fuburbs of Trapezond, and all the adioyning coast; and retyring, were received into the port of Ghiosleue, belonging to the Tartars, which augmented the jealousie, that they would vnite.

A new rebel in Asia.

At the same time there appeared a little rebel in Natolia, one Ianet Ogli, a simple Spahinot about 24 years of age, dwelling in the plains of Tyria; who vnder the colour of reformation of the commonwealth, came down to Smyrna with ten thousand soldiers. The city amased. fent to Constantinople for succours, but received an answere as cold as their means to belie them: The Christians fled to their ships, by chance in the Port : the governor to the Castle. But it seemed he had privat quarels with some great men in the towne, whose faction sentout 4000 (hot to keep the passage, which being beaten, he came before the city and executed his wil. beheaded two Caddees, punished divers insolent soldiers, placed and displaced the Office cers, and proclaiming peace in the grand Signiors name, offended no man, nor did any spoyle but giving a particular protection to the Consuls, and promising them in their quarel, if they were oppressed, to return with his rod of correction, he departed to his own home without any further trouble. The operation of that medicine proued wholesome, though it appeared dan. gerous; and he pretended to have had order from the State, a disorderly way; but it was likely they did rather conniue at, than approoue of that rude execution of justice. Howfo. cut r, not long after he had disturbed Smyrna, he tooke vp armes again with a greater powers which followed the impunitie or prosperitie of his former attempt; for he marched toward Bursia in Natolia: and the State was forced then to take his actions into consideration, which they would have overfeen. There were two Councels held about him, and a refolution taken, while his forces were but new and wavering, to refift the beginnings, and to fend out some frength to suppresse himibut who should command, who would obey, or whom to trust, could hardly be agreed. He still vsed the name of the Grand Signior, and the common blind of rebellion, Reformation: but what he would have, or whither his designs drew him, was the more & dangerous for the vncertaintie.

The Armado fent into the Blacke-Sea for suppressing the Cossackes, arriving at Varia, a garrison towne kept by Gebegies (an inferiour Order of souldiers) there sell out a quarrel betweene them and the lanizaries. These (after the sway of their insolence) would take from the other their Ouens in their owne Towne: which being not endured, a private fray was begun betwixt them; which breaking out into a faction, the fellowes of both Orders became interessed and ingaged, and they fought a sharp battell; many of both sides fell, to the number of a thousand. The Captaine Bassa, who could not prevent this quarrell, sought to appeafe it, by doing some justice against the Gebegies; but it proued onely enough to inrage them against him as partiall; and too little to satisfie the Ianizaries, who thereupon sorsooke I the gallies, and kept the land, leaving the Armado without foldiers to gard it, in danger of the Tartars and Cossackes.

The great Vizier in Asia gaue command, That no soldier should retyre to Winter Garrifon, but fray with the army about Babylon, the fittest season being then to make the war; disposing himselfe in the mean time to take in places of lesse import. Abassa Bassa moved not, and promifed obedience in other things, but to go out of his hold of Arzirum he did peremp; torily refuse.

The yeare and feafon was full of contagion, which was observed by some forewarnings, and some extraordinarie disposition of the aire and accidents: For on the eighth of May as midnight there was a great and fearfull earthquake at Constantinople, which indured about M fix minutes, and croffing the fea, was felt in Greece, Afia, and the Islands. And on Munday being the twenty ninth of Iune, at night there began a most terrible tempest, with soviolent and continual thunder & lightning, that al the city of Constantinople shewed as if it had bia

A' on fire ; at the end whereof fell a storme of haile, that brake tiles and glasses, so that stones by renort were taken vo of a hundred and fifty drams; but from credible witnesse that weighed divers of them, the next morning there were found of fixty and feventy drammes apiece, (which is about seuen or eight ounces) wherewith many were wounded. On Sunday the third of July another tempest of thunder and lightning began at Constantinople, which burned a woman and her childe in their bed, and flew much cattell in the field. And the fifth of Iuly the fickenesse was growne to that height, that the Turks proclaimed their publike procession and prayers; which is performed with great solemnity by the Musti and all the Mullaes, accompanied with the Visiers and chiefe of the city, attended by the people at a little Moschy on the edge of the plaine of Achmadan, ouer the water on Grecia side: which ceremony is neuer vsed untill the mortality exceed a thousand a day; which was casily knowne by the burials, that were all made without the wals, and account of them were kept at energy Port, and that day was numbered only to go out of the gate of Adrianople nine hundred and feuenteene. On the eighth following there died a thousand thirty foure: by computation of the whole (being many Ports of buriall) there could not die leffe than two or three thoufand a day, besides Galata, Pera, and Scutari, the infection being spred almost into all the villages. The fame day, Proclamation was made in the city, That no Butcher should kill mutton: a mutrion or plague (whither was vncertaine) having taken that fort of cattell fo violently, that they died in multitudes with fores in the fields; and it was not knowne what men should eat, nor where safely to prouide it.

Vpon the approch of the great Vizier toward the Prouince of Babylon, there was a moti. The Perfect on made on the part of the King of Persia, of peace; but it was understood by the Vizier to fright debe but an artifice to delay his Army. There came Embaffadors from the Princes of Georgia, the Gurgania who having formerly depended upon the Perfian, were about nine yeares before betraied and fending Emtyrannifed by him: in revenge whereof they having taken protection of the Grand Signior. and the last overthrow given to the Persian (though attributed to Abassa) being executed by a Nobleman of that Nation, they then fent to offer themselves in a consederacy of that war,

The meffage was acceptable, and the Archbishop of Calcedon their countryman appointed to receive, entertaine, and returns with them as Embaffador from the Port, to confirme and dispose the whole Nation (who were gotterned by three Princes) to enter into this League, and to make warre vpon the King of Persia. The race of those three Families had long ruled that Countrey, whereof one was accounted the chiefest (though the others had severall jutifdictions) of which the mascilline line was then failed, except only one, who being made Turke young, was a Bassa neere the Red Sea. The State sent vnto him, and made meanes to the Vizier, that hee might returne and be their Prince; but on condition that he should become a Christian; but that being denied them, they elected the daughter of their last Prince, norwithstanding their antient Law, that excludes the succession and rule of women; and haming procured therein a dispensation from the Patriarch of Constantinople, those Embassadors had also order for formes sake, to procure the confirmation from the Grand Signior:

16 The Ianizaries mutined in the Blacke-Seabeing againe appealed, the Captaine Baffa fent our Sackfachi Baffa, having made a fleet of an hundred and fourescore frigots, and armed them, to keep the rivers about Ofu, by which the Coffackes descended. Sackfachi arriving at Olivard finding all quiet, on the Biram day went ashore; and being at dinner, was surprised by the Goffackes, and hardly of caping, loft all his fleet, and many of his men. The Captaine Balla having advice of this exerthrow, made all halte to Ofu, and finding no flew of enemy, resolued to go on towards Caffa; but that night the Cossackes descending with their boats Bymany out-lets, the Bassa of Osu sent to him to returne speedily and make haste towards Constantinople, for that the enemy, growne proud with their late victory, supposing no other force abroad, were directly gone for the Bofphorus, and were refolued to affault the Imperial 1 the Coffactor.

A citylor at leaft (as they boafted) to burne the Arfinall. Vpon this aduice, the Captaine Baffartiume to the fer faile, and the next morning by breake of day, and in a fog, fell in with the fleet of the Cof. fackes (confishing of three hundred and fifty frigots, that catried from forty to fourescore musketiers apeece) and was formingled with them, that he could neither vie his ordnance for the danger of his owne gallies, nor avoid them without fight. Thus engaged, the Coffackes Kkkkkk furioufly furiously began the assault, and being three or source boats to one gally, boorded them; twice G they entred the maine maft of the Admirall galley of the Turks, killed three at the helme, and broke the rudder off; which being againe fastened by soure Christian slaves, and the Sunne breaking out, so as the gallies could vie their great shot, and the winder sing, the Cof. fackes were forced to leave their fight, and betake them to their oares; where in parting, with the ordnance(as was reported) thirty boats were funke, and fix or feuen hundred men taken vp. The conflict was bloudy on both fides, being come to hand blowes, and therein the land yaries almost consumed. The Captaine Bassa sent to the Port for supply of men, and all that tooke pay of the Grand Signior, even to the old foldiers which were put to penfion, were fent away, some to make gard at Chanakchy by land, on the mouth of the Bosphorus; other by water to re-enforce the Armado, and all was filled with trouble and terrour. The feare of the Tartars likewise was not so extinguished that there was not cause to expect some attempt by land, Shachi Gheray being in armes; and those motions if not suddenly appealed, would occa-

The Plague at that time taged as if it would have dispeopled the city of Constantinople and the villages adjacent, and the Francke Nations did all feele it; but the Turks and lewes by Armies, as if they went to conquer hell, if there were no league and confederacy betweene them. On the three and twentieth of July there was Corban or facrifice made at the gate of the Seraglio, two Becues and a hundred Sheepe: at euery other Port of the city two Becues and some Sheepe for the contagion and warre.

Innet Ogli returned againe towards Smyrna, and the Chaya or Lieutenant of the Bey of the city, raifing three thousand souldiers, went out against him, hoping to draw more to follow him : they met at a plaine, and fought valiantly, Janet Ogli remaining victor, with the death of the Chaia, and two thousand of his men : and he was dayly expected at Smyrna, having sent before to assure the people that he would do no violence to any Trader or Inhabitant, but only renew the Oath of obedience to him, and punish some that were authors of this enterprise against him. The Merchant strangers were so consident in him, as they purposed not to stir, but to receive him as their Protector; and thought the Rebell an honester man, than any Inflice of their Towne. The mystery of this strange course could scarce be penetrated, for he ftill reported he had authority from the Grand Signior; though it was denied at the Port, for they were glad to know how to quiet him.

Yet not many daies after, he fought a battell which he loft, and was taken, being betraied gen and flains. by his owne followers; and it was defired that he might be brought aliue to be seeneat the Port , but the lanizaries crucified him, and fent his, and his mothers, and his brethrens heads together, so that the tumor was suddenly allayed.

About the foure and twentieth of September the gallies returned from the Blacke Set, with the loffe only of foure, by a great storme. The Captaine Bassa brought in triumph two hundred and seuenty poore Cossackes, and was received, as if Pempey had againe finished the Piratique war, that almost famished Rome. But they did not triumph at the victory, but ouet the conquered people; and they esteemed this sea fight next to that of Lepanto; but the nobler for the escape : for doubtlesse if the winde had not risen too great for the frigots, which were in number neere foure hundred, the whole fleet had beene in danger to have been towed Northwards euen ento the jawes of the Enemy.

About the same time, the great Desterdar, Treasurer of that Empire, was sent for into the redactions. Kings Gardens, and there by the Bustangi Bassa strangled and flung out in his shirt into the into the Arects, Atreets, an vivall end of riches and greatnesse in that Court. Otherwise, the State of that Bmpire did then produce no remarkeable alteration: for the jealoufie of the Tartarswas somewhat appealed; but the Termes with Poland were vncertaine, while the Collackes were yet vnrestrained. The Grand Signior vsed all flattery to the Tartar Han, to enter Poland in reuenge: Which he promised, and rode as farre as Akyrman; but from thence excused his not proceeding upon the waters: which was doubtfully interpreted. That he had no will. In the M meane time the King of Poland fent an Army against the Cossackes, to shew his sincerity so the Peace; which was very well taken of the Turks.

The Georgians in the meane time gaue a blow to the Persian, and sent many of their heads weethram by to the Port by a Nuntio; who was prefently dispatched away with the Bishop of Calcedon, A as Embassador of the Grand Signior, to enter league with those Princes, to make some diuersion. Abassa the old Rebell would not yet truit himselse with the Visier, but pretended bewould vnite himselse with the Georgians in the service of that State; although he fortisied himselse strongly, and discharged all his Ianizaries. The Grand Signior to assure him, or to preuent that hee should not reuolt, sent him the dignity of a Visier, a Sword and a Vest, and authority to make war in company of the Georgians, in quality of a Generall (fo well a firong Theefe prospered there:) and hee arrived not long after with his army at * Mosull, a * William. place recourred from the Persians in the way to Babylon: who understanding of supply of eight thousand, sent thither by the Persian to re-inforce the garrison, sent out a party of Courds, that encountred and broke them, obtaining a full victory with the fall of two thou-B fand, and the Generall and two young Sultans taken prisoners; who were sent to the Port, with the heads of their followers. The news of which ouerthrow was received with much joy and content in the Court. The Visier demanded a million and two hundred thousand Checquines to be sent before-hand for soure moneths pay of the Army; giving this reason, That foreseeing he must Winter in those parts, and that Babylon would be defended, it was necesfary to have mony to hold his fouldiers together; for if he should divide them to their Hybernation, it would be August before they could be drawne into the field, and the Spring lost: and to hold them that were already almost in mutiny, were impossible, vpon credit. To this end all waies were vied to raife money ; a third of which fum was fent from the Port, but the rest was hardly found (for the ordinary charge far exceeded the revenue) and fell very heavy vpon fuch as were forced to contribute. The Persian King, reported to be taken in his limbes at the same time (which did commonly forerunne some sudden enterprise) lay with his Army about Tauris, indifferently to fuccour Babylon, and to attend the Circaffians, or to make some diversion when he should fee the Visiers Army setled and ingaged in a siege: Which was not long deferred; for hee besieged Babylon, wherein was eight thousand Persians in desence. His regular army (consisting of Ianizaries and Spahies, directly paied from the Grand Signior) were lodged on the one fide; and the Beghs (which were thirteen) with the Timariots and Souldiers repartited on their gouernments on the other. As they began their approches, in a morning twenty thousand Persian horse fell into the quarter of the Vizier, and did a great execution : but the D alarme taken by the Beghs, they came to his rescue, and the Persians retired. In that saction there fell fine or fix thousand Turks. Whereupon after there was made a generall muster, and not found about foure thousand Ianizaries of twelve thousand, nor ten thousand Spahies, of thirty thousand that were written for the war: so that all the strength did rest in the Beghs, who were well followed, and little care or obedience in the other Orders. There were seuen Princes of the Arabs, who were subject to the Grand Signior, and ought to serue and aid him when they were commanded; but being fummoned, they raifed their forces by common consent, and staied upon their owne borders; answering, They durst not displease the possession of Babylon; but if the victory did returne, they would yeeld their antient obedience vnto the Grand Signior: and if the Persian did hold his recoursed right, they also R would no longer acknowledge any superiour, being (as they pretended) borne of free Anceffors.

About the five and twentieth of March there fell a great storme vpon the Bailo of Venice, 1 6 2 6. for an accidentall fight by a Venetian Vessell with a Bey of Andry : Many of the Turks were flaine, and the Captaine Baffa pretended great damages; auerring, That their gally was rich and rifled. He aniwered wifely and floutly, That it was a chance, and would understand of no composition, but onely write to the Senate to examine the cause by instice. But the Turks fought to draw an inference, That he, as Procurator of the Republique, was bound to fland in Law before the Iudges of the Port (where he was like enough to be heard and condemned F together) and then to remaine as a Pledge for fatisfaction. But he would not yeeld fo much advantage; infifting, that he was an Embassador, to expound the sence of his Prince, and to maintaine the amity: and so by his standing mute the businesse rested in discontent.

The government of the Turkish Empire daily declined, and (as a great and strong Body) The largering had violent luctations before it yeelded and wasted. The lanizaries about the last of March mutine skeinsh Kkkkk a mutined affection of the noglastic mutined age.

mutined against the Bostangi Bassa, for beating one of their Order (for disorder in the night) & by the Grand Signiors command, and before his window. For by their Canon, they ought to be delinered to their owne Capes to be judged and punished; yet, though the Emperors Word should be about the Law of his slaues, and though he avowed the fact, sent, and wrote vnto them, nothing would appeale them; onely his life they pardoned, exacting his displacing, with sentence of incapability ever to be are office. He had beene a good servant to his Master, carefull of the publique Honour, scuere against the licentiousnesse of the times, and therefore vnfit for them. Afterward (following the example) they began to quarrell with the Vizier, who had fauoured the Bostangi; and with much labour they were silenced for a time, but not quieted. This was their estate: What could then strangers expect, when the Emperor suffered injuries of his owne bondmen?

At the same time, an open rupture betweene the Grand Signior and the King of Poland was like to succeed an invasion made a little before into Podolia by the Tartar Han; who returning from thence with a great prey, was met, and loft with a part of it, the greatest part of his Army. Whose brother Shachin Gheray refusing to accompany the action, as contrary to the Peace and his Oath, fent the Generall Konepolsky the copy of the Order from the Port; which being discouered, the Vizier hearkened after any overture or meanes to make vpthe breach, and to procure a new reconciliation. But the ouerthrow gluen to the Tartars encouraged the Poles to declare their reuenge, and to anow the attempt of the Coffackes, who were then ready with seven hundred frigots to fall vpon some part neere Constantinople, munition being allowed them, and a Polish captaine to every boat. They threatened to fight with 1' the Grand Signiors Armado, and made a vow to inuest and carry away the Admirall galley. All the villages on the Bosphorus to the gates of Constantinople trembled, and the city it felle was not without feare; fostened by certaine prophecies and Astrologians, who foretold a great blow from a Northerne ; copie. Twenty gallies kept the mouth of the channell, and the Captaine Baffa was to depart within ten daies with forty more; almost already conquered with his owne and the common feares.

The Grand Sigfirged before Bibylen.

Certaine newes was brought from Babylon, That the King of Persia had besieged the Viziers campe, and that he was lodged vpon his Trenches, and had cut off all accesse and prouision: fo that the Grand Signiors care was then greater to sauchis Army, than to recover that City. Yet his Ministers did abate little of their pride, but were more ready to does wrong or any infolency than ever-infensible of their owne estate, or diffembling it a peruerse

The King of Poland being yet very loth to breake the peace with the Grand Signior, which had been concluded betweene them chiefely at the instance and mediation of his Majesty of Great Britaine; although the Tartars had entred his countries, and done great spoile, he caused his Minister to write to his Majesties Embassador at the Port, to lay downe their just complaint: which the Bmbassador did, in considence of his friendship with the Chimacham; to whom he went, directly pressing him as well to a consideration of his Masters and his owne estate, as of that of the King of Poland: That all the burthen and blame would fi nally light upon him; it being the vivall way of great Princes, to discharge their failings and & errours upon their Ministers. This admonition moued the Chimacham much, and this was the substance of his answer:

In all Lawes and Religious (faid he) there is nothing more edique than to be esteemed a Lyar; because Law and Religion presuppose truth, ofpecially in great Asmifters, upon whose faith much of the publique quies dorb depend : but moft especially at such a time (for then it was * Ramazan) separate to denotion, that it was most whominable to God to five are a lye, by whom he swore, and by the life if the King, all whose bonefits might be porsonto him in his heart, if ever either hear his Muster general order or intimation to the Tartar Han to enter Poland, or to doe any att contrary to the Peace which if he had done he might justifie, seeing the Cossackes the yeare before did make the first break, and gaue the oceasion. To witnesse this affertion hee called the * Reitzkatab, who made no M feruple, jurare in Verba Magistri, to sweare to what his Master had said: onely he confested there were Commands written to Mahemet Gheray, by intelligence and confent of the Polish Generall, to enter the country of the Coffacks on both fides, to reduce them to obedience; with retiriction of any damage to be done to those comprehended in the Peace and that

A what soeuer the Tartar Hanhad don more, was and should be disauowed, as beyond his Commission. Many other matters he repeated, as the remoue of Cante-Emir, and the death of Hagy-Key, only to avoid any occasion of their parts. And in conclusion, all his discourse tended to an expression of desire to maintaine a good and perfect Peace. His Majesties Embassador asked the Chimacham, what he was willing he should write in answer to the King of Polands Ministers ? Who briefely answered, That they had no other intent but to keepe the late Treaty; and that if upon the Poles part (as they had begun) the Cossackes should be rethrained, they would take absolute order with the Tartars; who had no other pretence of quarrell, but a claime of a certaine pension (mentioned in the Treaty) vsually given them which if his Majesty of Poland would establish, there should never be more occasion of those mutuall laments : that it were a dishonour to the Grand Signior, to seeke and entreat the comming of an Embassador to settle those late disorders; but if the King of Poland pleased to fend one, he should be received with all rives and respects. To this the English Embassador replied, That he doubted some ill example of the vsage and detention of others, would make the Polacke wary, and difficult to engage any person of Quality. To which he gaue all fuch affurance of good and free acceptation as words could expresse. All which, the Embasfador returned in writing to the Ministers of Poland; entreating both parties to conniue at what was past, and endeauor by all meanes afterward to restraine those mutuall incursions, which were begun anew by the Soffackes, the noise of whom had ftrucke the Imperiall city with great feare.

Vpon the third of Iune the Spahies affembled in the Hippodrome; discontent with the The Spahies gouernment of the old Chimacham Georgi Mehemet Baffa (the ableft and wifeft man in that mattam is to State, but to Christians malicious, and of the Poles a continuall persecutor) who had the au firangud. thority of the great Visier in his absence at the war, and in great fury ran to the house of the Musti, and demanded of him to pronounce a sentence of death against him, and that hee would rife and informe the Grand Signior of their will; which if he refused, they threatened a generall repolt, and to doe their owne justice. There was no remedy; the Emperor being enformed, was pleased instantly to displace him, and to give the office to Regeb Captain Bas. fa,or Admirall, and his office to * Imbrahor Baffa; hoping thus to quiet all-matters. But this . Mafter of gaue them no satisfaction, they demanded in greater fury his life. The poore old man was the borfer retyred into the Grand Signiors protection, who vied all meanes to appeale them, offering to banith or confine him: but nothing would content or separate them untill he had delinered him up; who the next day was strangled and throwne into the streets, where the Barbarians vented their spleene voon his dead body, cutting off his cares and note, and carrying them in triumph to their fellowes. Presently they demand the life of some others, principally of Mo. rat Chiaus the Customer (odious to all men) whom when they could not finde, they sacked his house. Within a day or two after they began to be quiet, vpon promise, That if he could be found he should be rendred to them, and others be brought to Justice: but all feared that that Pestilence and Destruction of the city would escape by force of his money, having three times before beene in the like danger. That great Minister or Chimacham was ninety fix yeares old, had been forty five yeares Visier, and thrice Chimacham. The great services he had done, even to the preferuation of the Empire, nor any other respect could protect him from this rage. The occasion then taken against him, was, That he did conceale the ill estate of the army in Babylon, flattering the Grand Signior, while their fellowes perished; and certaine Letters written in bloud, pretended from the Campe, produced to accuse him; which afterward were discouered to be written in Constantinople. When the sentence was delinered to the Boftangi Baffa, he came to the lodging of the Chimacham in the Kings Garden.

where he thought himselfe in fan ctuary, and for reverence to his age and place, held it being written) in his hand, rather to intimate, than to be the messenger. The poore old man perces uing it defired an houre to pray; and conjured him to warne the Grand Signior, hereafter, not F to be so easie to consent to shed innocent bloud, which within few daies he would repent and fastly he entreated, that he might not die by the foule hands of the Hangman, which cost him deare; for the Bostangies executioners, either for respect, or for want of skill, could not finish his life (fogreat was his old heart) in one houre: he was buried by a few Rascals, his owne feruants hid, and no man daring to accompany him to his last Bed. The immediate foregoing discourse was filled with the injustice and infolency of man; G but this bringeth with it the example and justice of God, who reuengeth the bloud of his enemies and wicked men, vnjustly spilt, to preserve his image cuen amongst them that sludy to destroy it. To this may be fitly applied that boldnesse, zon esse cura deu securitatem corum, effe viltionem: The lanizaries either envious that they had no part in the last sedition, or being innocent, vnwilling to participate in the infamy, or rather it was their turne to do some what; forced the boats of the gallies which lay aboue Constantinople in the channell, and The tanigaties came downe to a garden house vpon the sea in the night, where the Emperor prinatly repo. petition against field, and began to exclaime against the death of the innocent; protesting they had no there therein, but as obedient flaues they defired the peace of the State, and that Iustice and quietnesse might returne to the City; and requiring reuenge vpon divers whom they accused as H the authors of those tumults, they named their owne * Segmen Bassa as the principall, and eighteene of their owne officers, and divers others of the chiefe Spahies, who held councels together, and were become heads of Factions; which vntill they were all cut off, there was no hope of good government and peace. The Grand Signior gave them milde words, and promifed to do justice, and to punish all such as should be found guilty: but nothing being don to fatisfie them, and it being beleeued that the new Chimacham conniued, and had bin a party to all their counsels, at least his preferment made him obnoxious to that suspition; and it was most true, that the Segmen Bassa and his followers & faction were the contriuers of the fall and muther of Georgi Mehemet Baffa, and very probable that he was fauoured if not prote-Ged by the new Minister, the Ianizaries rose againe, and by force brought downe the gallies 1 neere the City, and landed and held a Councell very secret in their chambers. This bred much suspition and feare; but the day of publique audience being come, according to the custome, they repaired all to the Seraglio, and waited in their order : their Seemen Balla only did not appeare; and it was thought he absented purposely by agreement with the Chimacham, lest there should be some occasion to examine the past businesse, which would not endure the light. The * Diuan being finished, and the Viziers and * Caddee Leschers comming towards the gate, they were stopped by the Ianizaries, and told plainely they would speake with the King. Such persuasions as were requisite were vsed ; but there was no remedy, they would deliuer their owne message. The young Emperor at first was assaid, and retired, but to avoid greater inconveniences, resolved to come out to them. Order was instant. ly given to fend for the Musti and the Antients of the Law, and many * Santons, for the Secmen Baffa, and others of quality to be present at this action. In the meane time a Throne was brought out, and placed in the great Court, and the Grand Signior came forth and fate in his Majesty, attended and assisted by all the great Ministers and Officers of his Empire, to strike a reuerence and scare into the souldiers, whose purposes were not yet discouered. Contrary to all expectation, an Electo spake for them : In all humble manner profesing their obedience, and lamenting the fickene fe of the State, and the dayly infolencies; and declaring, as they were not guilty of this last mutiny, so they were ready to spend their blond in defence of their Prince, and fir the reformation of those disorders (to which there could be applied no remedy but by the sword of Institute cut off all those heads which held Connenticles, and plotted dayly alterations, onely to gonerne thembole I Empire at their will.) They desired their Petition might be accepted, and those disturbers of the peace Songht out and executed in which they would affift : and that new names and titles might be forbidden, which many had taken up as Heads of Fattions; and the Souldiery reduced to their antient discipline: Which if his Majesty would grant and speedily put in practife, they were ready to die in his seruce, otherwise, as there was no hope of quietnesse, so they did foresee greater mischiefes dayly contemplated, which they would oppose as well as they were able. At the end of this Oration (which might have become a Cato) they deliucred a briefe petition in writing, wherein they modestly accused the new Chimacham of confederacy and conniuence with their Segmen Baffa, whom they anew appealed, and gaue vp the names of those their owne Officers, and Spahies, vpon whom they layd all the burthen of the dayly tumults. The Emperor gaue them a short, but satisfy factory answer; yeelding to their request, yet mingled with some admonition such as became a Prince: and so they departed every man to their owne rest. But the Segmen Bassabauing some intimation that his name was renewed in that lift of death, tooke the first opportu nity, fled, and hid himselfe; and divers others conscious of their owne merits, retysed, and

A thereby condemned themselves : not one roaring Spahi to be seene in the city; all things were so calme as if Afras were descended. There was no distemper but in the heart of the Chimacham, who was afraid to bring his complices intotriall, and yet was fure if they were not taken, their escape would be his ruine : for the Ianizaties exacted of him an account of the execution. With much diligence the Segmen Baffa was apprehended, and brought to the Court. He was first examined, rather to finde his owne treasure which was infinite (for hee had the spoile of Greece in the last gathering of tribute-children; and of the Setaglioat the death of Sultan Ofman) than to discouer other men. The Grand Signior sent for him, and after few words, gaue fentence to have his head strucken off; which was instantly performed before the dore. Afterwards divers of both Orders were taken (as was reported, to the numberof twenty two) privately strangled, and throwne into the sea; and some (principally branded) were hidden and fled. This trouble turned the Grand Signior to account many waies: for by confiscations he advanced a million and two hundred and fifty thousand Dollars of the Segmen Baffa; by the Scrivano as much; by others, very great summes; and, as if peace had rifenout of the graue of the old Chimacham, there was heard no more noise: the Spahies shrunke, and the Ianizaries as their glory tooke vpon them an austere reformation. But there were many inward fores and discontents, which notwithstanding all this cleere aire, were like to breake out, and one storme could not be sufficient to care or purge the corruptions of that State. While the Grand Signior was thus troubled with appealing his disordered and mutinous This and Signior Ministers and slaves at home newes was brought from Babylon, That his campe there was in nier, tray in great extremity, besieged without by the Persian, Master of the field, and consequently of their prouifions; nakedneffe, famine, and discases within, were more terrible than the Enemy; and the supplies sent, staied at Dierbeker, not daring to proceed without better gards : infomuch as if speedy succors were not given them, the army must dishonourably and dangerously breake and steale away. But hereupon there was a publike Councell held, in which all Orders as well civill as military affifted; and a prefent supply collected, and a Generall chosen to conduct them.

The Grand Signiot, because the greatest part of his land forces were thus busied and employed against the Persian in Asia, sent his Letters (at the instance of the Prince of Tran-D syluania) to diuers Kings and Princes vnited for the liberty of Germany, to encourage them to perseuerance and constancy in such designes as were fit for that purpose. But this was an art of Gabor, to infinuate (by this (hew) into the Grand Signior an opinion of great confederacy with those Princes, to make himselfe more valued and considerable at the Port; and on the other side to improve his authority in Christendome, by the pretence of so much credit, and fo great aids ready for his service. Written in the middle of the month of July, 1626. In Constantinople.

About this time there arrived a Letter from the King of great Brittaine to the grand Signior, concerning the Treaty of Algier and Tunes, and complaining of divers injuries done to his subjects, and requiring justice and redresse, Which being respectively answered, are worthy of publique communication.

His Majesties Letter to the grand Signior.

HARLES by the grace of the most high God, King of great Britain, France and Ircland; Defender of the Christian Faish, &c. To the high and mighty Emperor Sultan Morat Han, chiefe Lord and Commander of the Ottoman Kingdom, sole & supreme Monarch of the Eastern Empire, sendeth greeting.

TE have under flood by our Embassador resident with you, with bow much honor and respect the death of our dear Lord and Father of ever-glorious memory was condoled at your Imperial Port: And if the henification therof, and of our peaceable succession to these Crosons, baue not in all this time come price you immediatly from our selfe, it bath not bin through any default of our affection, or respect to you, but many important affaires whon our first accesse, and the dangerous infection where with our royall city of London, and many D other principall parts of our Kingdom have been visited, have diverted vs, and forced vs to defer these offices longer than we intended or defired. And as we hope you will for these important reasons, readily and freely excuse those omissions which in so weighty occasions may well be differfed withall; fo we pray you to be affured, That wee are defirous that the amitie which hath of long time bin held between our predecessors, may be remued, continued. and confirmed; and the intercourse of trade betweene our subjects and yours, be maintained and preserved, for the good of both our kingdoms and people. And to give you the better proofe of our reall and sincere intentions therein, we have ratisfied, and do ratissic the treaty made by our Embassador Sir Thomas Rowe in that your Imperial Port, with your Sublests of Algier and Tunes; and we canot doubt, but that you for your part will keep a constancie in the exact performance thereof, and to that end will lay your royall command upon the fe your vallals of Algier and Tunes, duly to observe the articles of that Treaty in all respects toward our subjects. We do like wife recommend onto you, and pray you, in conformitie to our defire of friendship and good correspondencie, to confirme and ratific those priviledges which have bin formerly granted by your predecessors to our Merchants, and to inlarge the same according to present occasions, and as shall be most convenient for the good of both our Kingdomes: which as we will fludy by all good means to keepe up in full force, and most advantagious execution; fo ree may not omit to represent unto you the grieuances of our subicts when they are uniustly wronged, contrary to the capitulations between us, and we presume without your knowledge or confene. That which we have now to desire your justice in , is, First, for excreame injuries done by inferior officers, and especially by one Morat Chaus a Customer of that Port, who hath not only broken, but also scorned and contemned the articles of the Capi- G tulation, and that in the publique Divan, to your dishonour, and to the great prejudice of our Merchants. Secondly, an open injustice don to our subjects in Algier, wherin our English Consul and the rest of our Nation were restrained of their liberty, their goods seised upon, and forced to pay great sums of mony, contrary to justice and the direct terms of the Treaty. But if while we on our behalfe do observe the Capitulation, and all good tearnes of friendship, such meane persons as Customers and other Officers be suffered and borne out in these vinils info lencies and oppressions upon our subjects, in a manifest breach of the Capitulations, we canot sencies and oppressions openions in subjects, but must according to their humble suit, give H order to withdraw their persons and estates from such dangers, wrongs, and injustice; volesse vponthis our instance we find a speedy redresse exemplary punishment inslicted vponsuch as have or shall transgresse the rules of justice, and the amity and contract between vs; which The recommend to your judgement and eare, as a matter wherein the welfare of our and your people and countries is interessed. We do further particularly pray you to give expresse order for the upholding and maintaining of that article of priviledge, for the paying but only of one Custom within all the ports under your jurisdiction, with free liberty to export any commoditie, bauing once payd custom, without further charge, and that our subjects be not exacted upon contrary to that priviledge. The further particulars of our subjects grievances, and what else we desire to be negotiated with you, we have given in charge to our Embassador Sir Thomas Rowe, to whom we pray you to give credit, and to return vs full answers to the severall points of this our letter. Wherin if you shall give reliefe to our subjects, and punish those that violate the capitulation, we shal receive it as a fingular testimony of your justice, your goodintentions toward vs, your constancie in your contracts, and your judgement in what hath relation to the good of your owne Dominions 3 and we shall be ready to answer that realtie of yours, in what soeuer shall rest on our part to perform.

Dated the first of March, 1626;

The grand Signiors Answer to his Majesties Letter of Great Britain.

Prince Morat, euer successefull;

O the mighty Prince, reverend amongst the Maiostics of the Princes of the Law of fe sus, obeyed of the great Potentates Followers of the Mellia, the onely Director of the important affairs of the Nazaren people, Soueraign of the limits of honor and power, the most glorious CHARLES King of Great Britaine; To whose last dayes we wish all felicitie.

O the fublime and happy Throne of our high Port, the Seat of the perpetual Vicariat, the which by the mercy of the Divine Maiestic of the mighty God, and by the grace of the Lord was the Scale of the Prophets, upon whom be continuall blefing, and the refuge of the Princes upon the face of the earth, and the Sanctuarie of the Potentates of the world four Letter with accustomed finceritie it

A arrived, by the hands of your Embassador, the elect among the Nation of Messiah, Sir Thomas Rowe, resident in our happy Port, to whose end we wish blessednesse. The which, according to the antient Ottoman sustome, and the wied Imperial forme, was by our supream Vizier and glorious Vicegerent translated and expounded; and being presented before our State of most ample honour and selective and seeme by our Imperiall eies, and confidered by our benigne fight, from the beginning to the end, our noble under-Randing hath intirely perceived the inferted bufineffe, and all particulars thereof and our diferest after ction, from the least to the greatest, hath comprehended all your proposed affaires, all which conduce to love. The principall whereof is (besides that you have fully mentioned, and declared the flate of the Amitie that between both Dominions hath been preserved by your Fathers and Ancestors) That now your Majeftie, after your Father of glorious memorie, being by inflinheritance afcended to the Regulatic of B those Crownes, doth aduise vs. That you also more than your Father, are stable and sirme in the same way of friendship, and most constant towards we in preservation of the Peace and good correspondence, and daily attentiue to endcauour the firengthning of the Peace and Amitte with our Port, and refolued to accomplish the same, and not to faile in any part of louing correspondence. With which your friendly alwice, with most sincere words expressed, are to Us most gratefull, That you in a blessed houre, and a happy time, have possessed, and begun to reigne in the Kingdomes of your Father; the secret of our purel beart was greatly resourced, and did conceive abundance of contentment, and our Imperial Assiefly alfo hath therforcobtained, and together expressed all manner of gladnesse and lowe toward your Migely, in diningne you all happinelle.

You have also admised vis That your above named Embassador yet abiding in our blossed Port, having formerly treated with those of Tunes and Algier, and contracted concerning your Merchants, and their free traffique and commerce in those partss, and conformably with them agreed, concluded and confirmed the Peace: thew hich being very profitable and commodious to both our Kingdomes, that you have alforate. tified, and in the whole condificended thereunto, desiring, That on our behalfe also the fame should be obserned : and to the end that for ever hereafter there may be no deviation from the fame Accord, and that to the Merchants according to the antient Custome, going and comming to these parts to traffique and negotiate, contrary to the Imperiall Capitulation, no initry may be by them done : That we (bould fend to our Vice Kings our expresse commands. Therefore you shall know, That we have already sent to our full lice-Royes, with expresse order our most efficacious and Imperiall Commandements, and firstly charged them. Never to transgreffe the same contracted Agreement; and that they take heed, Not to do any wrong or D violence to any of your Merchants (contrary to our Imperiall Capitulations) trading and ving those

And furthermore having fignified onto vs, That certaine Magistrates and Customers of some Scales of our well defended Empire, contrary to the Articles and Couenants w itten in the Imperial Capitulations, do make divers demands of greenances and impositions of your Merchants, and vinder the name of Mcfteria, * and fuch like, do present and exact money from them: and having also a larged vest hat con . charle formable to the Imperial Capitulation your Merchants having paid their due cuffome, and transforting dance their goods to other Scales. That they also demand of them a new Custome: Therefore it being in no wife our Imperial will that in our prosperous days, and iust and peacefull reigne, according to our Imperial Caspitulation, That wrong should be done to any man; We have given upon this particular, our requisite and E Sufficient Imperial Command, and streitly commanded and ordained, That they shall never transcresses Imperiall Capitulation and that the Nation of your Merchants in what place or Scale focuer they shall no the Magistrates and Customers do all diligence, that the faid Merchants may line quirtly contented'y and securely and having payd in one Scale the custome of any merchandise, which being not sold, and that they thall transport it to any other Scale, that they take great heed, not to domand nor take of them any new Custome, nor cuer, contrary to the Canon, to exact of them any new imposition or other crie-

You have also further aduised ws, That the late Huffreph Baffa, while heremained in the charge of Vice-King of Algier, did whinfligtake your Conful, refident in Algier, with the Merchants which linedwith him, and bauing imprisoned them contrary to the Law, Inflice, and the friendship betweene E vs, didtake from them certaine thousands of Dollars, and had done to them other areat wrong and damage : therefore, feeing it is more cleere than the Sunne fline day, that it is not in any fort by our confent, that such injustice and insolent actions should be committed, and there being then present in our happy Port some of the principall persons of the garrison of that place of Algier, who did know the whole proceeding, and we having commanded they should bee examined of that businesse, they were presently Lillil 2

brought to Iustice, and being all of them variously reprehended and affrighted, they did answer, confessing and obliging themselves. That all the money taken they would repay from the revenue of the custome, and Fifts collected; and as soon as they should arrive in Algier, they would take order that the Consuland all the Merchants should be set free. In conformity whereof, we also have written our most effective and all command, reprehensive and threatning, directed to the Vize. Re of Algier, and commanded him, That in this busines here so negligence, but that without further delay he set at liberty the said Consuland Merchants, and restore vinto them entirely all their goods taken from them, and that he know, that hereafter such action shall be pardoned; and that your Consul sent into those parts, according to antient custome, shall be entertained and honoured, and that bee doe punctually observe and execute the due tearmet of six consulations.

And in the Conclusion, concerning all the included particulars of your Letter; in due forme, and H besitting our Majestie the Fountains of Instice, and conformable to the Tenor of our Imperiall Capitulations, there have been written divers our noble Commandements, and consigned to the bands of your said Embassadour; and for the time to come, in all things which shall lead to the increase of our friendship, and those offices, commodious and prostable to the Merchants of both our Dominions, our Imperial study and attention shall not bee spared: and be you assured, that the termes of our Amitie and good correspondence which to this day hath been continued, shall bee of we with excellent endeavor main-

But being informed from our honorable Gouernor, wife Councellor, and Visier, Haydar Bassa (whose plendor God preserve) whom wee have assigned and sent to the custodie of the boundlesse Agman, that there is come a petition, with a representation and attestation of the principall of that Kingdome, to our I happy Port, declaring, That in times past, in the gouernment of our Fezeli Bassa, Vizier, now dead, be. ing that certaine men of war appertaining to your Kingdomes, had contrary to the Capitulations, affailed the Merchants which with their goods returned from India, and fought and taken their ships, andit being made knowne to the said Fezeli Bassa, that our Merchants had been damaged to the value of six hundred thousand Dollars: which action being it was contrary to Law, suffice, and our Imperial Capinlation, and that it was requisite that the footlers should be condemned, the said Fezeli Bassa did collect from the Masters of the said men of warre, for the said goods taken from our Merchants, an hundred thousand Dollars, and did consigne it to the true owners: and whereas there was yes remaining to them fine hundred thousand Dollars, the which to this day is not satisfied, the said men of warre not contain ning themselves in due forme, have armed a new seven ships from your Countrey, and have come and asfailed fourteen ships of our Merchants, which from India were failing to the Scale of Ayman, and haning taken the Masters prisoners, have made spoyle and depredation of all their facultie; and that now the Dutch Nation and your men of warreride at anchor in the Port of Mechagand do pretend the return of the hundreathousand Dollars taken by Fezeli Bassa. Whichbrute and scandolous wickednesse, in affront of our Imperiall power, to dare to perseuer, and to spoyle and ransacke those parts, being signified to the feet of our Imperiall Throne, the Ocean of Iustice, and that shose robbed Merchants are subjects of our well defended Dominion. Being in no manner our Imperiall will, that there should be lost one of the said Vessels, nor any the least part of their goods detained, and being that such an action is very ingratefull, and oppugnant to the Peace and friendship between vs contracted, to the end that all the faid Merchants may bee fet free, and that their goods and faculties taken, may bee entirely restored to the true [owners ; which your Majestic causing to be done, you shall accomplish the requisite termes of true Amitie, and Shall fulfill the offices of our sincere Correspondence, and shall strengthen the foundation of our good and mutuall fidelitie and League, wee have written you this our prefent Letter, full of all effectuall

At the arrivall whereof it is convenient, that in conformitie of the great perfect and spotlesse Amitic between your Ancestors and our happy Port, and the Imperial house of eternal glory, and the antient good Concord, V nion and Correspondence, that also your Maiestie should be sirme and stable in all water, with just proceedings to preserve and maintaine the meanes and Orders of friendship descended from your Fathers and Ancestors. And if your Maiestie desire and will, That the termes of Amitie, and our good correspondence shall be carefully observed and kept, you will then bestow your good diligent and Mear, that the above mentioned happened action, so discrepant from our Imperial minde and will, that is as is about written, That the source shows of our Merchants which came from India to our well defenced Dominion, and Scale of Ayman, and were taken and surprised by the English Men of war, and the Merchants which were found in them all made slaves, and all their goods and faculties made prizes.

A that they may be all set free, and all the goods taken from the said Merchants may be entirely restored to the true owners; and so your Maiestie shall have conserved our most happy mind and affection, and protected our most honorable and noble desires: the personning of which your friendly office, undoubtedly will produce to your Kingdomes many beneficiall and prositable effects; and certainly you shall sinde, that it will redound to the great honour and same of your Maiesty. And by the Grace of God, after that this our happy and most lowing Letter shall arrive by some honourable person, and to you faithfull; be you pleased to fend advice to our excelse Port of the manner of your used diligence and affection in this businesse, and of the effect of the libertie of our ships and Merchants, and of the full relitation of all the goods taken, to their right owners; and with what readines you have expressed your sinceritie and affection to our imperiall Maiesty. Which businesse we have also earnessly recommended to your above named Embassadour, B that when he shall more largely have enformed you, that you be pleased to give him credit, and that in the time to come you will attend to apprehend all those means worthy the conservance of our Friendsh p. seace, and Correspondence.

Written in the fifteenth of the Moon Gemaziel evell, in the years of the departure of the Prophet, you whom be eternall bleffing: 1036.

Giuen in our well-defenced City of Conftantinople.

Which is the 20 of Ianuary, 1626.

Vpon the opportunitie of the foresaid troubles within the Turkish Empire, and either to giue reputation to the Armes of the House of Austria in Germany, or to affright Gabor, and diffolue the correspondence which he had practifed with some Allyes, or perhaps hoping really to obtaine a peace, and by the ease both of expence, and vse of so many souldiers on the the frontier of fo great an enemie as the grand Signior, to effect with more expedition their univerfall ends; there was in the month of lune, in the yeare 1625, a Gentleman dispatched from the Vice-Re of Naples, in a frigot of the Spanish King, accompanied with fix or seven feruants, with Commission to goe to Constantinople, and being there arrived, to deliver certaine Letters of ouer ture of a peace between the grand Signior and the King of Spatie. To assist him in his Negotiation, there was sent by seucrall waies a Benedict Prier called Padre Beriland a Greek brought up in the colledge at Rome, called Cannachi Rofis, both practifed in the waies of that court, and formerly imploied in other fernices of intelligence and exploraration. Their Instructions were forked; these to practise on the Greek Church to supplant the Patriark; and if both the treaty & their machinations should fail, to attempt to raise the Cosfacks by promife of a fum of mony, to trouble the grand Signior, and to divert his forces and refolution from affifting the Prince of Transylvania in Hungary, as thall be at large mentioned in a fub fequent diffeourfe. The gentleman was born a Bolognete, and had ferued Gallaro Gratiani, late Prince of Walachia, and by that means had fome experience and acquaintance at the Port. On the way he gaue himself out for an Embassador: which raised more rumor, and gaue warning to those who were disaffected to the success of his undertakings. But before we relate how he proceeded, it will give fome light to later negotiations, to look a little higher, vpon what ground and occasions this enterprise was advanced.

The State of Spain having often (especially when it was pressed with any necessitie) practifed to make a peace with the Turkish Empire; particularly by the mediation of a lew, taking the name of Gabriel de Buena Ventura, who was sent with Letters and instructions from Christophore de Mora and Catagneo the Secretary in the time of Rodulphus the second, who had then war with Sultan Morat; whose enterprise being discovered a Vienna, was by the Emperor for interrupted. In the year 1619, the Baron Molart being then Embassador for the Emperor Ferdinand, he dispatched first a Captaine called Francisio, and after him Padre Amonio Berill, with instructions of one tenor vnto the Duke of Ossuna, then Vice King of Naples. The substance was, That he found the opportunitie saire, and the Turkes inclined to make a generall peace with the House of Austria: that therfore this scason should not be omitted, but that the duke should presently dispeed to him some man of qualitie and wit to affist, and fit toma. G nage fo great a businesse: That this man so chosen, should not take on him as directly sent from Spaine, because it would then be expected that hee should appeare as an Embassadour, which would require great expence in presents and traine, and waste much time in ceremony. Thus the Negotiation would be most properly and expeditely persected by him and theembassador of Casar, because in the Capitulation of 1 606, betweene the Emperor and the Grand Signior, it was expressly cautioned, That it might be lawful for the King of Spain to enter into that Treaty, & to be comprised, if it pleased him. To these were added divers reasons instructions, examples, and acculations against the Venetians and Hollanders: but the cardinallargument was, That by obtaining this peace, the King of Spain might with securitie subdue his Rebels, and finish his conquests, and defend his Indies from sear of invasion, threatned after M expiration of the Truce in Holland. Some other ouertures were made in these instructions and reasons to inforce them, which the modestie of Historie and reuerence to Princes ought to omit. But this negotiation being involved in that of the Emperour, which succeeded not according to their expectation, fell before it was ripe. Yet the reason continuing, to shut that backe port, when their Armies were busied with other designes, the said practise was renued by the mediation of another Portugal Iew called Cormaro; who went into Spaine in the year of our Lord 1624, and was thence returned to Naples, and from him and his offers occasion was taken to fend this Bolognese to the Port. Who beeing now arrived at Constantinople, tooke first sanctuarie at the house of the Agent of the Emperour : where meeting with Beril and Rosi, and consulting which way to lay or begin their businesse, they at last resolued to work by the Agent to whom they were adressed, and not to discouer themselves untill they faw how the generall proposition was tasted. Their Instructions were framed of fine articles, 1. To mooue a perpetual peace between the King of Spain and the Ottoman Empire. 2, To induce the acceptance wherof, to offer to fet free all the Turkish slaues, to the number of four hundred, which were then in the Spanish captiuitie. 3. To undertake and promise to secure the subjects of the grand Signior from all losse and spoil in the Mediteranian sea, and to keep the coasts and shores from all inuasion. 4. To undertake by the Red sea to serve all theempire with the riches and commodities of East India, at better rates than they did buy of the English and Hollander, and in them to advance the Customs eighty thousand Dollars yearly. 5. Lastly, That the King of Spaine should oblige himselfe to procure the King of Poland to restraine the Cossacks from their vsuall excursions in the Euxine sea. These were amplified with many reasons, arguments, and accusations; but in the conclusion restrained, That if they saw no probabilitie to obtain and affure the Peace, that then Berik should proceed to prouoke the Coffackes; and this Gentleman should not appeare in the Negotiation, but refide in the house of the Emperours Agent, under the name of his Secretarie, untill further di-

When these propositions were first moued, the specious shew made them acceptable; but when the particulars were weighed, especially that offer, To keep the sea and the coasts of the Mediterran free from any spoyl or inuation; the Vizier moued a question, Whether the king of Spain were soueraign Lord of the Duke of Florence and the grand Master of Malta? and L if not, how he could command and restraine the Knights of Saint Stephane and Malta, who were Religious Orders, and sworn enemies to the Port? To this objection receiving no clear and satisfactorie answer, the Vizier began to mistrust, and to demurre. But delayes (which are vsuall in that Court) not suting with the account which this Bolognese was bound to render vnto the Duke of Ossuna, of his successe, Either to assure the peace, or not to lose the opportunitie of a diuersion by the Cossackes; caused him to attempt both at once, and to imploy Padre Berill to execute his part. Who beeing taken in Silistra vpon suspition, by the Baffa Diac Mehemet, and his Letters opened, the Spanish friendship was discourred; and the Bolognese stole himselse out of the Countrey, and as it was reported, was at his returne imprisoned, for the vanitie of intituling himselse as a publique Minister, and venting his ma- M sters name vpon sogreat a Theatre. And the Agent of Casar assisted to accuse him, as not able to containe him within the limits of his Commission, but that hee would wilfully break out, and dispute, That hee ought personally in the name of the Vice Re to treat with the Vizier: threatning, To cause his Pension from Spain to be retrenched, as cold in the service of that Crown, the civile strife proceeded from heat to blowes : and it was beleeved, that the Agent under hand both hastned his flight, and procured his punishment.

The ill and disgraceful successe of this attempt, and the differtion between ministers so firially obliged by common ends; made many beleeue, that the wife State of Spaine would not again rathly and fuddenly ingage their reputation to a second scorn. But fear and necesfitie, that obey no rules, inforced as it feemes the Vice king of Naples (for all these practifes were masqued under his name) to do a seruice that would be most acceptable when it was done. For the rumor, That the Prince of Transylvania did prepare an army, and that the grand Signior had given order to the frontier Baffa's to affift him, and that the Count of Mansfelt and Duke Weymar were expected with their troups to loyn with him; this collegation appeared terrible, and to threaten Vienna it felfe; and therfore it was judged the best counfel, open-Iv to offer a Peace, to amuse or separate the force of the Turk, or under the shadow of a treaty. to fical away the first opportunitie of action. So that contrary to all expectation, suddenly in Aprill of this year, it was suddenly aduised from Ragusa, That there was there arrived in a 1626. Galliot of Naples, another Mercury, a Spanish Gentleman, that openly avowed himself to be really fent from the Vice-Re, to offer a peace to the grand Signior, and to prepare the acceptance of Embassadors or Commissioners sit to treat it. He was well attended, and furnished with exchange, and earnestly commended by the Vice King to the Senat of that City. At his first landing he made gravitie; and expected some ceremonies and reception: but those small States, who are like a grain between two mill-stones, thinking their greatest safety consisted in taking no notice, and in being on both fides diff intereffed, would not understand him; and he finding himselfe deceived, was caried in a close chaire to the Monasterie of the Friar Minors, and kept himselse privat; only sending another Letter (which was written to a Vizier at the Port) to those Magistrats, desiring them to dispeed it by Posts to Constantinople, and to prouide him Guides for his journey thither. Both which were done, and two Turks appointed to conduct him. Before his departure, hee dispatched another Currior to Belgrade to a Correspondent there. It was likewise aduised from Ragusa, That he was laden with presents. and had order to spend freely : which was dangerous in a Court where all things were vendible; and those that fauoured the Designe triumphed, and accounted the prize already won; nothing being more discoursed than the Peace between Spaine and Turkey. As a fore run-D ner of this negotiation, to fmooth the waies, there was fored fome weekes before this newes. a Letter printed in Spaine, Cum Licentia, as written from the grand Signior to the Catholike

King; offering Peace, and promising to separate from all his Enemies, and to leave them to iust punishment, and neuer to assist or support them : with a Catalogue joyned, of an infinite present that should bee sent by the Turke to procure the acceptance of this amitic. At the first fight this Letter was despised as a fiction: only some contemplatine mendid make confirmation, That it was foread to encourage the people of Hungaric, and to remooue the feares of the Turke; or to raife a jelousie in Gabor and his friends; especially being seconded with a concurrent rumor, That a Minister really was sent to treat peace, and an Embassador expe-Red to follow him, that at least he should be received to gaine time. But these were poore shifts for so great and wise a State; yet what soener the purpose was, whether it was a counterfeit. or directed to some end, it was taken up and vsed as an instrument to reject the embassage and to prohibit the bearer to approch the court. For whether it fel into the hand of a Moore-Franke expelled Spaine, or were made vicof by any Embassadour that defired to crosse the conclusion of such a peace, in such a conjunction, so dangerous to many princes and states, it was shewed the great Visier and Musti, commented upon, and urged as a great affront to the grand Signior. At which they took so high and sudden disdain, that they gave instant Commands, and fent horimen to beat the waies, with commission to all the Beglis and Caddees to affift them. That where focuer they did meet or find this gentleman, they should carry him direally back to the fea fide, and fee him shipt; with admonition, not to prefume to land on penaltie of death. And other letters to check the Senat of Ragusa, for receiving any minister of their enemy, without asking leave or consulting the State.

The Gentleman was by this time advanced four daies journey toward the Port, where hee fel and brake his leg, and was carried back in miferable pain to Ragufa, and returned to his old lodging, the duke should presently dispeed to him some man of qualitie and wit to assist, and fit to ma. G nage so great a businesse: That this man so chosen, should not take on him as directly fenr from Spaine because it would then be expected that hee should appeare as an Embassadour. which would require great expence in presents and traine, and waste much time in ceremony. Thus the Negotiation would be most properly and expeditely perfected by him and the embaffador of Cafar, because in the Capitulation of 1 606, betweene the Emperor and the Grand Signior, it was expresly cautioned, That it might be lawful for the King of Spain to enter into that Treaty, & to be comprised, if it pleased him. To these were added divers reasons instructions, examples, and acculations against the Venetians and Hollanders: but the cardinall argument was, That by obtaining this peace, the King of Spain might with fecuritie subdue his Rebels, and finish his conquests, and defend his Indies from fear of invasion, threatned after # expiration of the Truce in Holland. Who beeing now arrived at Constantinople. tooke first sanctuarie at the house of the Agent of the Emperour : where meeting with Beril and Refi, and confulting which way to lay or begin their businesse, they at last resolued to work by the Agent to whom they were adressed, and not to discouer themselves untill they faw how the generall proposition was tasted. Their Instructions were framed of five articles. 1. To mooue a perpetual peace between the King of Spain and the Ottoman Empire. 2. To induce the acceptance wherof, to offer to fet free all the Turkish slaues, to the number of four hundred, which were then in the Spanish captiuitie. 3. When these propositions were first moued, the specious shew made them acceptable; but when the particulars were weighed, especially that offer, To keep the sea and the coasts of the Mediterran free from any spoyl or inuasion; the Vizier moued a question, Whether the king of Spain were fouer aign Lord of the Duke of Florence and the grand Mafter of Malta? and L if not, how he could command and restraine the Knights of Saint Stephano and Malta, who were Religious Orders, and sworn enemies to the Port? To this objection receiving no clear and fatisfactorie answer, the Vizier began to mistrust, and to demurre. But delayes (which are viuall in that Court) not futing with the account which this Bolognese was bound to render vnto the Duke of Ossuna, of his successe, Either to assure the peace, or not to lose the opportunitie of a diversion by the Cossackes; caused him to attempt both at once, and to imploy Padre Berill to execute his part. Who beeing taken in Silistra vpon suspition, by the Baffa Diac Mehemet, and his Letters opened, the Spanish friendship was discoursed; and the Bolognese stole himselfe out of the Countrey, and as it was reported, was at his returne imprisoned, for the vanitie of intituling himselfe as a publique Minister, and venting his ma-M sters name vpon so great a Theatre. The ill and disgracefull successe of this attempt, and the differtion between ministers so Arially obliged by common ends, made many believe, that the wife State of Spaine would not again rashly and suddenly ingage their reputation to a second scorn. It was likewise aduised from Ragusa, That he was laden with presents. and had order to spend freely : which was dangerous in a Court where all things were vendible; and those that fauoured the Designe triumphed, and accounted the prize already won; nothing being more discoursed, than the Peace between Spaine and Turkey. As a fore runner of this negotiation, to smooth the waies, there was spred some weekes before this newes. a Letter printed in Spaine, Cum Licentia, as written from the grand Signior to the Catholike King; offering Peace, and promising to separate from all his Enemies, and to leave them to infipunishment, and neuer to affish or support them : with a Catalogue joyned, of an infinite present that should bee sent by the Turke to procure the acceptance of this amitie. At the first fight this Letter was despised as a fiction: only some contemplative mendid make con-Articion, That it was foread to encourage the people of Hungaric, and to removue the feares of the Turke or to raife a relousie in Gabor and his friends; especially being seconded with a concurrent rumor, That a Minister really was fent to treat peace, and an Embassador expeded to follow him, that at least he should be received to gaine time. But these were poore hifts for fo great and wife a State, yet what foeuer the purpose was, whether it was a counterfeit, or directed to fome end, it was taken up and vied as an inftrument to reject the embaffage and to prohibit the bearer to approach the court. For whether it fel into the hand of a Moore-Franke expelled Spaine, or were made vie of by any Embassadour that defired to cross the conclusion of such a peace, in such a conjunction, so dangerous to many princes and states, it was shewed the great Visier and Musti, commented upon, and viged as a great affront to the grand Signior. At which they took so high and sudden disdain, that they gave instant Commands, and fent horimen to beat the wates, with commission to all the Beghs and Caddees to affifthem, That where focuer they did meet or find this gentleman, they should carry him direally back to the sea side, and see him shipt; with admonition, not to presume to land on penaltie of death. And other letters to check the Senat of Ragula, for receiving any minister of their enemy, without asking leave or confulting the State.

The Gentleman was by this time advanced four daies journey toward the Port, where hee iel and brake his leg, and was caried back in miserable pain to Ragusa, and returned on his old lodging.

lodging. Where the horfemen found him, and delivering their letters to the Senat, demaun. ded to haue him giuen vp into their hands. But they refused to break their sanduary, and only promifed to obey the effect of the grand Signiors command, civilly to thip him & to fend him back to Naples: which was don in the presence of those Turks, and letters written by the Senat both to the Vice King and the Vizier, to excuse themselves, That they durk displease neither party, but defired to line in the grace of both princes.

The grand Signiors Command to all the Sanzacks and Caddees of Greece, to return the Spanish Gentleman fent from the Vice Re of Naples.

H

Pon the fighe of this our Imperial Signature, you shall take notice, That the Spaniards (being alwaies antient enemies of our happy Port, the Fountaine of felicity) baue of late sought to advantage themselves of some princes which keep good friendship & correspondence with vs : To which end the Viceroy of Naples did send the last yeare a Messenger to our Imperial Port, intimating, That the King of Spaine was defirous to have a peace with I Ds. But in regard they have bin ever our enemies, and that the peace which they did then offer was fraudulent, and only to ferue their own ends; we did not vouchfafe to give him audience, but rather rejected both bimselfe and his message. And now again we have notice eiuen rs, That there are others come to Ragusa from the said King of Spain, about the same bufinesse, with intent to come forward to our happy Port; Therefore wee have sent Mustapha our Capiel withour Imperial Command, That if any such persons shal come within any of your (eueral jurisdictions, that you stay them, and without one boure or moment of delay deliver them to him to be carried forth of our dominions, and made return into their own country. This is a busines of very great importance, and therfore we command you to be very wary and circumspect in searching out for such persons; and that you we no negligence or delay therein, but speedily obey and put in execution this our Imperial Command, not suffering any one what seeuer, comming either from the Vice-King of Naples, or the King of Spain, to proceed forward toward our happy Port. And you shall certifie vs in writing by the said Capigi, bow and in robat maner you have executed our Command. And if any such persons comming from the Vice-King of Naples or King of Spain, baue any letters or writings, you (bal take them from them, and fend them to our happy Port. And after you fall have feen and under stood this our Commaund, you shall give faith and credit to it, and restore it again to our slave Mustapha Capigi.

Another of the same Tenor was sent by the same Messenger, vnto the Commonwealth of Ragusa.

About the fixth of September the Prince of Transylvania sent a messenger in great haste to the Port, with Letters and Instructions to his Agent there; the substance whereof was reduced to two heads: First, to declare to the grand Signior, That his Estates in their Dyer, hy his consent, had elected his Lady to the succession of that Principality : and to require the confirmation, according to the antient Rites and Capitulations betweene them. For his sudden resolution, without consulting the Grand Signior, and in excuse of the sex, he proposed many reasons, all directed to one scope: That the encrease of the House of Austria was so dangerous to all Germany, that it was requisite to prouide for Transyluania, to preuent the corruption of an Inter Regnum, wherein the Imperials might worke diftemper and division: and therefore it was necessary that a Successor should be declared, and in possession; and one wellallyed and firengthened by the Princes opposite to the Austrians, which conditions meeting in his wife, made her without all exception. That this election was passed with the confent, and in contemplation of his Allyes and friends of the Port, and under their affurance of protection. And that therefore he should vige the Grand Signior to concurre and approve his care, emploied onely to preuent and humble the Common Enemy. Secondly, That whereas then fix yeares past, when hee lived in peace, without offence of the Emperour, he had beene commanded by the Grand Signior to move his Armes, and to provoke an enemy, now become irreconcileable: Which Councell had beene continued untill that time, by the most experienced Ministers of the Turkish Empire; and Letters sent him the yeare before of the same tenour; and that he had lately required a plaine approbation of his profecution of those designes, which being formerly indifferent, were now become necessary; He should now persuade them, not to lose this opportunity of confining the Emperor for ever within Germany, and fetling an affured peace and fafety to the Turkish frontier; that was by his conquest of Hungary. That if he found any difficulty in either of these, That the succesflonwere refused to his Lady, or succours to him to prosecute the warre; that he should vnmaske, and plainely protest. That he had been engaged first by the Grand Signior, and made confederation with many friends, with his confent and approbation, too late to be reuoked, and his owne honour fo far thereby exposed, that he could not retire, but would prouide for his owne fafety. Therefore as he would pay his tribute, and continue his faith; fo, if they would leave him to himfelf, they must not disdaine the like measure in their occasions, from him and his friends.

His Letters and messages were roundly delivered to the Ministers of the Grand Signior; and a generall answer given, That for the succession they would consult and resolute to his fit of fatisfaction; and that a Letter should be presently written to approve the antient Councels. The Agent not content with that coldnesse, nor well discerning the times, pressed the Vizier to a more direct and particular answer. But in the inflant there arrived newes from Babylon, That the campe was rifen and fled, The Grand Sigby the favour of the night, forced to burne their Tents and Provisions, and to breake their from Babylon. great Artillery, and cast it into the Euphrates; That the miseries in the Army had been such smen in the field neuer fuffered (confumed by famin, and fuffocated by heat: by this, twelue. thousand died in one day; the other might be judged by the price of a bushell of Barly, sold for thirty eight cheequines of gold.) That the Great Vizier had beheaded three of the most valiant Bassacs, hoping thereby to cast the enuy of his shame vpon them: and, That retyring to * Mosul, the Persian vsed his victory, and following a slying Army, did continual executivistics. tion for ten daies upon the Rearc. So great a blow the Turkith Empire neuer received; the newes whereof was taken with fo much fadnesse, that it was no season to treat of making acwwarres. The Emperors Agent made vie of this dejection, and opposed all the Transylunian negotiations diametrally, and promifed the present comming of a great Embassadour to ratifie the Peace betweene the Grand Signior and his Master. And the Turke knew not whom to beleeue, weakened in spirit by their successe and the present constitution; Futuri ambigum de magis quid vitares quam ent fideres certus; doubtfull of the future, and rather certaine what to avoid than whom to trust. Wherefore the Prince of Transylvania's Agent, tesolued, not to prouoke by an importune pressure, a dispairefull answer; but to give them time to recollect and gather heart, and to accept of their generall Letters, with a promile from the Chimacham annexed, That as soone as a sew daies of consultation and provision for their affaires in Asia were past, that he would enter into a particular consideration of his Master, and give him ample content in them; and that in the meane time he might proceed cheerefully.

The

The Truke of Drymin and Cunt Monf file arrive in South and and and and and and and and and are file.

The Baffa of Buda in the meane time fent a Post to the Port, with certaine newes of the G arrivall of the Duke lohn of Weymar and Count Mangelt in Silefia; and that the Prince of Transyluania was risen to joyn with them, having mutually exchanged and sent some troups one to the other; and that himfelfe was marched neere Vatz, to conferre with the Prince in his passage, to resolue together of the prosecution of their designes. W hereupon the Emperors Agent at the Port made violent exclamations; protested the breach of Peace, and vied fome scandalous arguments against the Friends of the Prince ; begged, threatened, and enforced all his powers to divert or affright the Chimacham, who knew no more than was infused into him and for the most part believed the last man, or as his skares guided him. This caused some stop of the dispatch of the inuestiture of the Princesse of Transylvania obtained by S'Thomas Rewe, and other negot ations of the Prince: And the Agent had procured a letter M from the Grand Signior to his Master the Emperor, of excuse, yet referring all conclusion, if they fought Peace, to a treaty with the Prince of Transylvania and Mortesa Bassa of Buda. Other Letters were dispatched to the Bassa, to beware of impertinent actions, to occasion an unseasonable rupture : yet so mingled and qualified, as that they intimated; any thing would be accepted that was throughly done: Against the inuestiture the Emperors Agent shewed all his wit and firength; objecting, That the was a woman, a firanger, and a German. By this only he hoped to begin a discontent betweene the Grand Signior and the Prince of Tranfyluania; knowing, that the election once paffed, would not be recalled, and that if it were not confirmed at the Port, the Prince and Estates of Transylvania would finde themselves wronged, and their liberty encroached vpon and perhaps feeke other refuge: for the Emperor would willingly have accepted any returne or afpect towards him. But the art, to fow a difsention, or to entice the Prince to depend upon the Emperor, and to take of him that which he could not obtaine at the Port, being at large opened to the great Ministers of the Grand Sign or, it was againe resolued to dispatch the Grant, and to send the Embassador with vsuall ceremonies: who was to depart within fix daies.

The Prince of Transylvania being united with Mortesa Bassa of Buda, dispatched from his Campe at Zetzen aboue Nouegrade, a Currier to the Grand Signior; aduiting, That Walficm, and Ifterhas Palatine of Hungary, were drawne vp with their Army to oppose his proceedings, and to keepe him from joyning with Count Mansfelt : Who fent to him a Gen. tleman to know the cause of his entring the Imperiall Dominions; and prosessing they came as friends, and offering many conditions, defired that order might beginen to both their Armies to retyre a daies journy, and betweene them a place affigued for Commissioners to meet and confider of some accommodation. To whom the Prince answered, he had no purpose to vsurpe any thing in Hungary, but only to deliuer them from the tyranny of the Germans, and to relieve his Allies oppressed, whom he could not betray; nor had he any power to treat with them. The Armies being neere, and parties abroad, did occasion some blowes, and great skirmithes for two daies; wherein on both fides some bloud was spilt, the Prince taking himselse to have the better, having gotten twenty fix German Launciers prisoners, and some light Hungarian horsemen; and that Walstein the third day retyred five Dutch miles, and fortified himselse at Wiuar. This faction was begun vpon the fifth of October. Voon the Enemies remoue, Messengers did mutually passe betweene the Prince and Count Mansfelt, and appointment made for their fecure meeting the third day after : Vpon which, Sabor promised to follow the Imperials, and to attempt them, Mortesa Bassa made an offer to set downe before Nouegrade; but was withdrawnerby the Prince, not to spend sime beforce Towne, and foth to give it to the Turks, Hewrote, That Count Mansfell had made agreement with the cities of Silesia, all ports being open to him; and that he passed, without any offence, and had brought with him some Deputies from Breslaw and the Nobility of that Province. That all the firong places of Hungary had fent to him, That they would not aid the Emperor against him, if he committed no spoile; and were ready to receius and obey him, if he were Master of the field, and able to protect them: And therefore hee now desi-M red a Command from the Grand Signior, to the Baffa of Buda, that hee might not retyre (according to the Turks vie) but Winter with him, left his Allyes thereby discouraged the opportunity of his part should be lost, and a faire entrance opened to the Emperor to follow a reuenge. The Grand Signior, who formerly was fo wary and backeward to confere

A to any breach, being now vnawates engaged, Lupum auribus tenens, holding the Wolfe by the cares, without scruple granted his desire, and the Orders were sent away; That what was done being past recall, Mortesa should Winter with the Prince of Transylvania, and not retire without his consent, but in all things follow his direction: yet limited according to their necessities and the nature of seare, full of caution, not to adventure upon uncertaine grounds; with power and infinuation to make a Peace, if profitable and sate Conditions should be propounded.

At length Count Mansfelt joyned with the Prince of Transylvania and Mortesa Bassa, having under his command souldiers, but miserably worne out with a long march (and durined with the Duke of VVeymar, who staied in Silesia) without any munition or sit arms so which is discouraged Gabor, who expected succors, but sound (as he pretended) a charge of yet as they were they resolved to set upon the Army of Walstern neere the river Gran the sixteenth of October; which retiring continually, upon the passage of the water, they sell on, and made a Thin any signest disorder, and tooke many prisoners, whose heads they afterwards cut off. Walstern being not able to suffer the fury, after this loss plainely fled. Whereupon the Vantgard fraction of the Prince of Transylvania sollowed him, and had slaughter of his Reare all the way be tweene Gran and Vaghe, which river the Enemy passage upon two bridges of boats, there was a new fight begun, and many of the Imperials cut off. The Princes troups entering the bridges pelle melle with them, got the passage, and having slaine a great many, put all the Army into greater feate: so that now they were resolved to follow them even to the gates of Pressurgand Vienna as they wrote to the Port.

Notwithstanding this good successe of the Prince against the Imperialists, he in the beginning of Ianuary (by reason of the hardnesse of the Winter, and that he received not such supplies of contribution from his Allies as he expected, and the Turks very desirous of a Peace with the Emperor, by reason of their wars in Asia against the Persian) sent a messenger to the Emperor, excusing his taking up of Armes, upon the unperformance of some Articles in his late Treaty, and the not sending an Embassador to the Port; assuming the necessity of ebedience, and offering to make a Truce for three moneths, and to dispatch Commissioners to the Emperor, to mediate the conclusion of Peace with the Grand Signior. To which he received answer, That if first he did not dismisse the Turks, and separate himselse from Count D Mansselt and his Troups (with whom he would admit no parle, nor make any accommodation) he would give no audience to any that came from him. Upon which answer the Prince returned to Cassouia, and Mortesa Bassa to Pessh.

Count Mansfelt also returning toward the State of Venice, in his way thither died at the Bossa Seray neere Spalato in Dalmatia: the newes whereof comming to Duke Iohn Erne flux, already weakened with a Feuer foureteene daies, he also fell into an Apoplexy, and died at Turocz in the North part of Hungary, where hee was quartered for the Winter. His body was opened, and not one drop of bloud found, but his heart withered to the smallesse of a Nut.

The Agent of the prince of Transylvania, in excuse of his master for this sudden defection, The had order to declare vnto the Embassadors of his Friends and Allies at the Port, That the free areas. Truce with the Emperor was not made by his Master alone, but by a consultation, where & real were present a Commissioner of the King of Denmarke, Duke John Ernest, Count Mansfelt, which is and divers Deputies of the Provinces of Moravia and Silesia; and the generall consent of the Councell of War, induced thereunto for these reasons: First, Because the Bissa of Buda was expressely commanded to retyre; who must obey, vntill he could better informe the Grand Signior, and if possible, incline him to the war. Secondly, Being to enter into consideration, if the Turks by no meanes could be induced to continue their Aids, that it might be gained to acquaint the Consederates with their estate, and to consult with them, of meanes to profecute the Enemy with their owne Forces; and to that purpose, that Count Mansfelt had takenhis voyage toward Venice. Lastly, the necessity of drawing to garrison, being a Truce in effect, they thought it no prejudice to aduantage themselves by one in words. That upon the eighth day of December the Embassador of the King of Denmarke returned to his country, fully satisfied and enformed of all their proceedings and Counsels; in which it was concluded to re-inforce their Troups in the Spring, by the affiltance of the Barons of Moravia and Silesia, whose Deputies were sent purposely to enter into the Consederacy, promising to join G their forces: and that in lune following the Prince would draw into the field, and march directly into Austria, to make that Province the seat of thewar; where it was promised that the King of Denmarke should meet him, and vnite their Armies, by which meanes only they hoped to finish the miseries of Christendome.

The ministers of the Grand Signior having made a great complaint vnto his Majestics Embassador resident at the Port, That some of his majesties subjects had robbed some of the Grand Signiors at the Red Sea, for which they required restitution, according to the Capitulations of Peace. Whereupon his Majesties Embassador writ this Letter to them as followeth:

To all Admirals, Captaines, and other Commauders of English Ships, Subjects of his most facred Majesty trading or nauigating in the Red. Seas.

Fier my hearty commendations and greetings, these are to let you know, That Haydar Bassa of A Ayman hath gruen information to the Grand Signior, That Come Enet [h hips in company with Hollanders, have farprifed divers Indian Ships, wherein (as they presend) were many Merchanis and Subjects of the Grand Signior and haue taken their goods, contrary to the Pente and Amity betweene his Majefly and the Grand Signior. Which Information (we being affered of your discretion, and well 1 knowing you have no such authority from his Majesty, nor any other derived from his Royall power) although we hope it is falfe, and that you no way baue exceeded your commissions and instructions : yet the lament of those parts being webement and many (wherein the Grand Signior hatb complained by his Letters to his Majesty purposely written; demanding Iustice of such action) and to preuent the prosecution of such courses, contrary to the Peace, and being thereunto solicited by the Chimacham, as a meanes to avoid all occasion of breach betweene both Nations, I have thought fit to fend you these our Letters of Adure to put you in minde, exhort, and require you. That you be very heedfull, not to give just os aften of offence and scandall, nor that you take or make prife of any ships or goods belonging to any Subject of the Grand Sigmor contrary to the Peace, Amity, and Capitulations of his Majesty for free commerce. Wherein you are wifely to consider the consequences of this businesse, and of our trade in the Grand Signiors Dominion, and that his Majefly will do justice upon all such as interrupt the publique Peace. We further desire you to examine the truth of such accusation, and to make certificate to me, of all the late proceedings of our Ships in those parts, that I may be able to give a reason, and to answer for you according to my duty that all our trouble here (which may be a great consequence) may be avoided: And for the future, exhorting you to do no action or violence to any of the Subjects of the Grand Signior, contrary to the Peace, for that fuch is his Majesties will and pleasure. And so I bid you heartily farcwell.

Given in Constantinople the nineteenth day of lanuary, 1626.

Although the Prince of Transylvania kept his Army in their Hybernation, and that the Grand Signior had given order (at the instance of some of his Ministers, favorers of peace) to recall Mortesa Bassa of Buda from his gouernment; yet it was most cleere, euident, and vndisputable, that the Prince did with all fincerity endeauor to continue the war, notwithstanding his Treaty, made for necessity, and referred for ratification to the Grand Signior. His private negotiation with the Capi. Aga and Caslar Aga, not communicated to any, and the good effect it wrought, was sufficient testimony of his constancy and inward purposes: and vpon the death of Duke Iohn Ernestw, that Army being in want and almost in mutiny, he relieved them, and gave them two moneths pay, one in meale, butter, hony, cheefe, barley, and other victuals, and the other in mony; affuring them that they should not want, vntill both M meanes and orders came from the Princes, to whom the Count of Mansfelt was dispatched. This the Prince writ to the Port, as a greater argument (because chargeable) of his desire to confirme the Grand Signior; which if he meant peace, had beene cast away. But after the death of the old Chimacham (protector of him and all his actions) the Emperours friends wrought wrought upon the pretended patriots, and converted their feare into a feeming fincerity and care of avoiding an engagement in a double war; who finding the State entangled in the troubles of Asia, made that the foundation, not only to dispute against any other, but to threatenthe contradictors of their opinion. These for the most part were men popular, but veterly ignorant of the present condition and affaires of Hungary; yet they so prevailed (qued in seditionibus accedit, obi plures erant omnes fuere, which hapneth in tumults where many arc. all men run)that the Vizier, to fatisfie them, was enforced to command the retreit of Mortela. Thefe things hapning in the instant when they concluded to dispatch a new Vizier, and to raise the foldiery, to follow him, there was no time to speake of another enemy, and those wife men could do but one thing at once. But the zeale of this Councell lafting no longer than while R it was blowne by Cafars Ministers, and that the supply of Asia was resolved, and the Grand Signior being fully informed by Gabors last Letters, which threatened as much on the other side. That if that opportunity was lost, and that the house of Austria should possesse Germany, or at the best, the Princes colleagued take the example and make peace, he must expect a tharpe inuation and revenge, then when he should have no friends, and their Army busied in Aliasorging the neere alliance of the Emperor with the King of Poland, the infligation of the Pope, and what focuer might beget a feare that they should be inclosed with enemies. This admonition taught them the wisedome to be content to keepe their opposites exercifed at anothers charge; and though as yet they durst not, or would not so openly declare, as to pull the war upon themselues, yet they found it necessary to be continued, and therefore they resolved to remporise, and to avoid a present extremity, by the volour of the Truce. In the meane time to leave. Bethlem Gabor at his liberty, and to observe how the Princes proceeded to maintaine and supply their Troups; meaning to step in when they should see their Army in the field. To this purpose Mortefa Bassawas re established in his gotternment, and the buline sie fo carried with him, that he should make no shew of mouing, vntill the time fir totake horse; and that then hee should have leave and command to correspond with Gabor according to the occasion.

The Emperor having had notice of these counsels and designes, dispatched a Dutch Gen. 1627 tleman toward the Port, with Letters and Infru Cions to his Agent and Friendsthere; and Apach Com-D commanded him to make his journey by the way of Ragufa; giving it out that hee was a throad see. French man, lest bee should be discouered in the shorter way by Buda, and stopped, and his detar on Park Papers and Instructions searched Norwithstanding all this disguist, notice come to the Port red to telegrate befor hand of the comming of this Meffenger; and the Ministers of the Grand Planior cau-Frent attra. fed him at his arrivall to be confined, not fuffering him to open a packet, and the Vizier forcing him to decipher his Letter to the Emperours Agent in his prefence, nortruffing him with his owne fecret. The fubstance whereof was vehement complaint against the Prince of Transylvania accusing him to be the author of all the troubles and discontents of the frontier. That fince his advancement it was not possible to maintaine the Peace, nor that Amity which was contracted betweene their kingdomes; intimating a defire to have him deposed, as a perturber of the World. Expostulating the mouing of those new Armer and the preparations of the Baffa of Buda. He had Letters likewife to the Grand Signior, but was not suffered to deliver them: but they resolved to send him backe to Buda, there to discover his message, and if it should seeme sit to Bethlem Gabor and the Bassa to treat peace, that then an Embassador from the Emperor should be accepted, but no inferiour person, nor querelous Letters. Thus it was plotted to be referred to the aduice of Gabor; who gave this counfell; thathe might in all occasion both know the secret, and direct the answer, and by making himselfe seeme necessary to the Turks, he guided all their resolutions to his owne ends. On the Other fide, Mortefa Baffa having had notice, that a meffenger was follen by, and arrived and heard at the Port, fent a Post with Letters, complaining, That he should have any entertainment there, or was admitted any audience: That if the Grand Signior had with confidence feally referred the conclusion of the peace or warre to Bethlem Gabor and himselfe, all other Treaty was impertinent and hurtfull, and might produce vncertaine or contrariety in the refolution; defiring that he might be dismissed instantly and sent to him, because one of the Imperiall Commissioners being arrived at Comara, had advertised, That they could not enter into conference vntill the returne of this Messenger. Whereupon the Vizier dispeeded G him without any answer to the Emperor, or treaty, or other resolution than that which was formerly mentioned; rather taking from him, than receiving his Letters; only a Fede for his discharge was given him, that he had brought and presented them, but comming from the country of an Enemy, they could not be accepted. Thus he was fent to Mortefa by a Chiaus, and with him an answer to the Bassa, That his negotiation was wholly referred to him and the Prince of Transyluania; with this caution, That hee should prograt, and beware to be rashly ingaged in an open war.

About the one and twentieth of Aprill news came to the Port from Cairo, fignifying the reuolt of Gemen in Arabia, under a pretending Prince whom they call an Ayman or Pricit: That he had ouerrun the country, and befieged the Bassa in the principall city. To whose reliefe the Bassa of Cairo had sent by Suachin in the Red-Sea three thousand souldiers; but it was aduited, that if more fucçors were not supplied, that the Holy Country would be lost. This caused frequent Counsels, and did much trouble the State; especially the feare of Mecha, Medina, and the deuotion to their Propher. The great Vizier arrived at Aleppo, but complained for men, munition, and mony : to raife the first, the Viziers of the Bench were sent abroad; one to Greece, another to Natolia, a third to Tartary, others to other places; infomuch as the City was lest desolate. Munition was aduentured by Sea to Scanderone; and mony was extorted from the poorer (per fas & nefas) or drawne from rich subjects (precario) to concur to affift in the publique want.

A dead filence now possessed all things; and there was little newes from the Prince of Transpluania, how he proceeded, nor what he purposed : only the tripartite Commissioners were mer at Comara where they treated; and the generall inclination of the Ministers at the Port being wholly bent to peace, they aduised Mortesa secretly, and excused themselves to Gaber voon the Musti; whose seares the Imperials had made the ground of their hopes, and that Councell. But it steemes it was resolued at least, not to breake; the Emperours Commiffioners proffing a refolution on the one fide, and Gabor on the other railing new difficulties, and endeauouring to diffolue the Treaty, and to leave the occasion of the warre open to time and opportunity. The Turks being driven up in a streight how to please both, fell at last upon the Prince, accusing him, That he had in December before treated apart, and made his owne peace with the Emperour, vpon conditions to his owne advantage, without confulting the Port: which was true; for voon the retreat of his Army, and the despaire of the forces of Count Mansfelt, (which he found weakened by a long march) and the difunion of the Generals, he had treated and figned Articles, but as he pretended, they were concluded in a Councell, with the confent of his friends or their ministers : which as he could not directly deny, so he did not absolutely consesse; tempering what he had done, with divers conditions; of the declaration of the consent of his Allies, and the ratification of the Grand Signior. This Treaty was noised and bruted from Vienna, and the copy sent to Constantinople purposely to discredit him : so that it was no more a secret; and thereupon the Prince dispatched a Post to his Embassador, to satisfie those who might except against him: professing not only what he had done apart by necessity, and for want of supplies, but that he would proceed in the generall Treaty : because there was no other way to viblinde the Ministers of the Grand Sig. nior; who so much affected the assurance of the Border, that they would not believe any arguments, as fauouring of other interests, but that he would at the convention raise so many rockes and impossibilities, as that the breach of the conference should be the beginning of the war, and a bond of necessity in the Turks to partake in it. The Emperor remaining still jealous of delaies, sent another messenger to the Port, with a second plaint against Bethlem Gabor, and Mortefa Bassa, as the disturbers of the antient Truce; and an expression of his feruent desire to maintaine a good peace with the Ottoman Empire, which he said could neuer be se cured, valeise the Grand Signior should place such Ministers in the frontier governments, as were louers of the publique quiet. For the establishing whereof he had sent his Deputies M to meet those of the Port, who having agreed (as he pretended) vpon Articles, and reconciled all differences, that he was ready to fend a great Embassador thither, to confirme what socuer thould there be concluded. This was done only to get an acceptance of some person of Quality to be present at the Port; which Gabor and Mortesa Bassa hindred, to keepe that State

A without any light but such as they pleased to give them. But it being objected to the Mesfenger by the Vizier, That the Emperour had made a peace apart with the Prince, and that therefore he had obtained his ends without the communication of the Grand Signior, which oaue much suspition of sinister purposes : the Emperours Messenger did not deny but that there was some such thing done; but that his Master did not trust in it, nor could cuer rest secure in the word of that Prince, vnlesse the authority of the Port did strengthen it. In conclusion, seare on the one part to lose an opportunity of peace; the death of Mansfelt, some disasters of the Friends of the Prince in Germany, and the failing of aids expected, all concurring on the other part, made both parts foften and decline, and refolue to take care only of their owne affaires, and to leave the World at liberty.

B The Captaine Bassa was sent up to the Euxine sea with a gallant sleet for slags and strea- The Captaine mers, resolute to attempt the shutting in of the Cossacks by building two Fores on the out chedwith an lets of the Borkithenes : who prepared to refift him, and were intrene hed neere his expected Armidonio descent. The Poles made some braues, That they would assist them, and maintaine their fron- the Blacke sea. tier, as Lords of that ground: but it was not beleeved they would hazard their peace with the Grand Signior, by fighting with his Generall, but rather connine till be should be retumed, and then to raze and ouerthrow what was raifed, and excuse it vpon their out-lawes, This enterptife was like to cost some knockes; but as matters then stood, the Poles were not in state to make any great progresse, the King of Sueden having diverted them to their owne delence in Prussia: yet how soeuer they resolued in this particular, they must keepe an Army on foot, lest they tempted the enemy to vie the occasion.

While all the Sea forces were imploied in this defigne, the Arches were left ungarded, and fix gallies of the great Duke of Tuscany came to the mouth of the Hellespont, and took one Gallion, and many leffer ships of the Cairo fleet; the booty whereof by report amounted to some millions of Dollars. This sudden alarme caused the Grand Signior to fend into the Blacke Sea to recall fome forces, and instantly from the Armado twelve gallies were spared, and dispatched to seeke the Christians, who were departed with their riches.

Therearriued at the same time a Persian Embassador at Aleppowith ouertures of peace: An Embassaypon whom the great Vizier put gards, neither accepting nor refuting his meffige; and fent for from translets at to the Port to declare, that the State must either formith him with a million and halt of gold, Alego, and storcof munition, or else granthim a Commission to enterraine that opportunity and motion of Treaty : for with leffe supplies hee could not proceed. The first was impossible, and the later much against the stomach; but a fresh advice bringing the report of a great Embaffador following the former with rich Prefents, and faire offers, made many beleeue or hope ahappy conclusion, though men of best judgements esteemed it very difficult, valesse Babylon should be surrendred. All men made this conclusion, That if peace could be settled on that fide, the Turks had yet foleene enough to reuenge the braues they had endured from the Imperials; who though they fought a Truce, profecuted it infolently, threatening fire and word if they obteined not their defires. And thus the Treaty at Comara had ebbs and flouds, heats and colds, as the feare or hope of the affaires of Asia did temper it.

I This expected Persian Embassador not long after arrived at the Port, with little hope to The Persian buy peace at a cheaperrate than the furrender of Babylon. And the gallies of the Grand Sig. Emballador aior sent in pursuit of the Florentines, by great diligence overtooke them in a Port of Morea, the Pare, and recourted all the prizes, [So their great wealth was like a dreame, when they awaked it whished:] And upon the sixteenth of Iune they returned and entered in triumph, towing in all the reprised booty. It seemes they were become too rich to fight, and the Turks, though Superious in strength and number, were content with the gaine, and glad not to force men alteady spoiled, into dispaire.

About the first of Laby the Bassa of Buda sent post to the Port, with advice, that the Empe-1015 Commissioners at Comaran had presented certaine Articles, containing accounts and restitution at which being fent to him, he had received, but could not allow them, answering, That the Grand Signior did not treat with Merchants; Which had like to have bred confulion: but that they were fince entered into new conference, and had concluded in the genelall, a resolution to peace; with consent that both parties should have time to fend to their Masters for fresh instructions in particulars. Whereupon he had disparched that Messenger to the Port, tovnderstand the sence, and to receive absolute directions from thence. By him G Bethlem Gaber did write a sharpe Letter; confessing plainly (seeing he could not longer conceale it) that he had made peace for himfelfe; but accused the negligence of those Ministers as the caute thereof: First, That they would never constantly trust his aduises of the opportunity of the war, but their Musti and Book men, who were fitter to enterpret their Law, than to judge of the World and matters of State. That he would be true to the Grand Signior. but yet not neglect himselfe, when he saw how little care of him was had, how little authoria ty and credit was given to him. That the Letters written to him from the Vizier were ambiguous and irrefolute, but divers others privately had threatened him not to be the occasion of a war. And therefore to proue himselfe faithfull and true to his owne first counsels, he offered, That if the Grand Signior would breake off the Treaty, and resolue to vie the time, H that he was ready to march in fix daies warning. He amplified the prosperity of the remains of Mansfelt Army in Silesia, the occasion, and all other fit arguments to moue them to a change of those degenerate counsels of peace. But this was an art to cast the fault on others. for the conclusion of that which he had suffered to proceed, and was beyond his power to remedy. Yet it much perplexed the Vizier, who excused himselfe, and returned all the blame voon the Lawyers, as men ignorant, by whom he had been ouerborne; and that he neuer confented to Peace or Treaty in his owne judgement, but had promifed fincerely according to his engagement, as far as he durst, and, that so much his continual! Letters witnessed for hims promiting, that he would cause a Consultation to answer these advices, and that he would not agree to any conclusion without the satisfaction of the Prince, and all others that were I friends to the Port, and the restitution of the oppressed liberty. Which solemnly handled in a full Counsell, Orders were dispatched away as the finall resolution of that State to leave the power of making Peace, or breaking the Treaty, to the judgement of Gaber and the Baffa of Buda, wholly and without restriction.

What effects this would worke was somewhat uncertaine; but such appeared the inclination of those into whose hands the Treaty was now referred, that there was a frong opinion, the Emperour of Germany should faile of the security expected: Especially because the ouertures of peace which the Persian made by his Embassador arrived at the Port, together with their necessity had raised some shew of inclination to hearken to accommodation in those parts. But it came aduised from the Treaty, That the Commissioners being met the second K time, the Imperials infifted upon high termes, demanding a ratification of the old Peace of Zitwa, then expired, without any addition or diminution, and by vertue thereof, restitution of Vatz, stollen during that time: declaring they had no authority to proceed to any new negotiation. To which the Turks replied, That fo much ceremony needed not, to appoint a folemne meeting to confirme that which two Letters onely from their Princes might have done: That that Truce being run out, was no longer in vigor nor in being. If they would treat a new Peace, that they were ready, but to expect any restitution, or reuiuing of the old, it was in vaine, and their meeting fruitlesse. And the Germanes as stiffely pressing their own propositions, the Conference was for a while interrupted, and a current rumour spread, The Convention was dissolved. But Mortesa Bassa discovering by discourse, That the Imperials L flood upon so peremptory points, as supposing that all the forces were drawne into Asia, and that the Grand Signior could not shew an Army on that side; suddenly gaue order to all the troups that were ready about Buda, and in the frontier to march to Peffit, and to shew themselues in the field. Whereupon the Germans began to mollifie, and were content to renew the Treaty. At a third fession they resolued to employ the force of gold, and to win Mortesa by corruption; to whom they presented from the Emperour six thousand Dollars, with promile of a greater reward. This Cast changed all the Game; and he undertooke both to difconer the designes of Bethlem Gabor, and to crosse him in his Masters Court.

The Ministers of the Grand Signior having exhibited a second complaint to his Majesties Embassador, for some wrongs done vnto his subjects in the Gulph of Persia, he sent vnto them M this ensuing Command, to observe the antient Capitulations.

To all Gouernors, Admirals, Commanders of Ships, Or other his Maiesties Subjects trading in the Kingdome or Gulse of Persia.

THereas Aly Balla of Balfara, bath fent his Letters to this high Port by the hands of two of his fernants inhabiting in those parts by them informing the Grand Signior, That the English Na. tiontrad no in the Persian Gulfe, in Ormus, Iasques, Mumbrun, and other parts of the Kingdome of Perlia . do make prize and take the Veffels and Frigots of the Subjects of the Grand Signior dwelling mBdfara, Lasha, and the Coasts of Arabia, trading to Meschit, India, Goa, and Calient, and that they make Slaves of all the paffengers, Merchants or other, that they finde upon the faid Veffils, being Subietts of this Empire. Further, That they do unite them felues with the Perfian (now in warre with the Grand Signior) aftifting him not onely with munition, but Vessels and Frigots; and that they help and teach the Perfians (enemies of this Port) to build Gallies, Galliots, and other Veffels of warre to arme in thole leas : providing them of Shipwrights and all other necessaries for the fitting of an Armado, therbyto inuade or beliege the Port of Balfara, or Lasba, or to make incursions upon the territories of this C Empire. Which actions being alleadged to be contrarie to the Capitulations of his most facred Majesty, and to the publique Peace and Commerce betweene thefe Kingdoms ; I have been called before the Chimacham, Deputie to the great Vizier, to make answer to these Obiections, and to prouide some timely remedie, before those proceedings should give further occasion of discontent. To which accusations, 1 being able conserning the fact to fay nothing ; but that knowing fuch actions to be uniuft and unlawfull, and contrary to the will of his facred Africatie, and your Commissions and Instructions from the Companie and your Principals, for whom you serue : I do hope that herein you have not offended, nor ginen any inst occasion of lament, unlesse you have been thereunto by like acts of hostilitic provoked Noswithstanding being procedby the creat Ministers of this Port : and that it will require so much time to informe his Maiestie, and to secke redresse by so long a course, (to whom neverthelesse the Grand Sig. nior will write his Letters of complaint, to require luftice in such case) and for the prevention of future euils of very great importance to the Subjects of his Maichie (which you may casily conceine) and for the declaration of his Maiesties lincere and constant purpose to maintaine a good and full Peace with the Grand Signier and all his Dominions, which I know to be his Muicflies royall will: and that I make no doubt of your obedience to all his Orders and purposes, like good Subjects that must answer your attions at the Tribunallof his High Iustice : I have thought fit and very requisite to send you this our Declaration, and in the name of his Maieflie to admonish and require you, That you presume not to take or make prize of any of the Veffels or Subjects of the Grand Signior, trading in the Scawberefocuer : nor tomake any spoyle of their goods, or hurt or detaine their persons : nor that you intermeddle in any inuasion or attempt of the King of Persia, to assist him or his Armies against the Subjects or Dominions of I the Grand Signior, neither by Sea nor Land, nor by providing them of munition, Shipporights, or other Ansmen, to teach them the wee of gallies, thereby to innade the Territories or Subjects of this Em. pire; but that therein you carry your sclues neutrally and indifferently, betweene two Princes both in Peace and Amitie with his Maiestie. Wishing you well to consider, the inconvenience which may arise toothers, and the damage in time to your felues, by teaching a powerfull Nation to afe their strength in Sea causes, of which they are now veterly ignorant, and of which practise wee have a lamentable exemplein thefe Seas. And no way doubting , That like good Subjects , you will conforme your actions and proceedings in those Seas to the rules of his Maiestie (for that such is his will and pleasure, In declaration whereof I have affixed his Royall Seale) yet I am inforced to protest, That the contrarie will give occasion of much trouble and danger unto your selves, and in the end losse and damage to your Prin-

Halil Baffa made great Vizier vpon the rout of the army mentioned at Babylon, was fent to G the war in the end of the last yeare, being arrived at Dierbecher, resolued to enter Persia (notwithflanding that the King had an Embassador at the Port treating of peace) and gaucorder to certain Beglerbeghs to make another inualion by Van; and did endeauour to draw Abaffa Baffa, with his forces ioyned with the Georgians, to do the like on his frontier, who gaue good The Fee fian be- words, and hopes of due obedience. Whilest these designes were in preparation, the Persian signib actività by his General besieged Achiska, a city of great importance neer Arzirum: Whereupon Ha-Mifent Diflenk Baffa of Natolia, with fix other Baffaes, to Abaffa, to perfuade him prefently to performe his word, and to rife and vnite his strength with them. With these hee sent three thousand Ianizaries under twelue Captaines, with his owne Letters; who being arrived neere the City, he appointed them to incamp, and sent them provision for a day or two, till he could 12 put his affaires for his departure in order. These resting secure, in the night he set vpon them, and cut them in pieces, some sew escaping to the Port. Diffenk and another, Auchmet Baffa, were slaine; the Captaines that he tooke aliue, or came to him to treat, be sent to the Persian : whereby Achiska being in great diffresse, and vnsuccoured, was presently surrendred to the Enemy. This newes being brought to the great Vizier, the next morning hee rose with all his whole army, laying afide all defigne against Persia, and marched right to Arzirum; vowing to punish the Rebell, or there to end his life: who was strong, fortified, vi &ualled, prouided, and

Notwithstanding all the colours, protestations, and perturbations of the Prince of Tranfyluania, That hee would finde occasion and quarrell to dissolue the treaty of Comaran, or 1 fort, of peace ... that he would separate himselse from the Turks; yet at last hee sent his Embassadour Francis Microferent to the Grand Signior, about the later end of October, to acquaint him that the peace was concluded. And within a few dayes after, the Internuntio of the Emperor arrived with a branch of Olives at the Port: And this Embaffador and two Agents of Gabor went to the Chimacham with a Letter from their Master, under the Seale, of great secrecie; of fresh aduice, That the King of Denmarke was vtterly broken and fled into certaine Islands, all his Countrey, and Germany proftrate at the mercy of the Emperour (which newes the Imperials had formerly spread) counselling the Chimacham to make an end of their peace with the Emperor, and to dispatch and to accept of any conditions, and to send the Internuntio away with speed and content; lest the Austrians puffed up with those victories, should take the ad. K uantage of their delay, and present them worse termes, or resule it absolutely. Whereupon the Ministers of the Port resoluce easily to peace; changing their former Enigmatical letters, and hudled up a hasty conclusion. They added further, That the Princes of Germany treated a Pacification, which was like also to take effect; and either way, that the Emperor would be at liberty to make war vpon him. Whether they seigned the first part, to accelerate the ratification, or feared the later, and that their Master should therein deseruedly be lest out, was hard to judgeibut they only by this office (which the Turke did beleeue was fincere) merited of the Emperor the confummation of what was done, and thereupon they Both made their atonement with the Emperor according to their feuerall Capitulations.

What was the secret cause and reason of this sudden alteration, (Gaber having made all de- L' monstration, that he would continue the war; having proceeded even to threats and protests against the Ministers of the Port; and being irritated anew after the conclusion of his owne Treaty, by the complaints and practifes of the Emperors Agents, to bring him into difgrace or ruine; so that hee could repose no trust in an enemy newly reconciled, and so often pronoked) did breed much inquisition, and many doubted some great mysterie, either of his revolt wholly to the Imperiall part, or that he had some other high designe in Poland. But those who were lesse speculative and curious, and looked only vpon evident matter, concluded, That the King of Denmarke being indeed distressed by Walstein, who vpon the privat accord of Gaber, was let loofe, and was become triumphant in Germany; and finding himfelf betrayed and forfaken by Mortesa Bassa, and that he could no longer disguise his owne ends, which were, Toob- M lige the Emperour to him for the Peace if it were made; and to blinde the Turks, to conuert their force and authoritie to better his conditions in the Peace; and that hee foresaw so much renitencie and inconftancie in them to profecute the warre, the vigor whereof depended upon contingencies and the successe of the Visier in Asia; that he resolved to

A prevent being prevented, and discourred. For certainly is he had not roundly shur up the occasion, by being the first that seemed to merit of both parts, by reconciling the difficultie hee himselfe had raised, he had bin stript naked, and lest in the state of the Constable Count of Fral between Lewis the 11 of France, and the Duke of Burgondie. This only was observed hvall. That what socuer the ends of Gabor and Mortesa were while they were virted in counsel. they did fuffer the grand Signior to know no more, than conduced to their own ends, & that they had practifed power to change the resolutions of the Port, with every wind of rumor they pleased to obtrude: And that if Gabor had bin countenanced and nourished in his hopes, towear the crown of Hungarie (which was the scope of all his intentions) that he had credit and wit enough to have moulded the Turks (who faw the affairs of Christendom only thorow n theglaffe of his relations) to his own defignes; and that hee would continue the War at his measure, and they at whose costs it had bin made, should have bin the least and last to know the internal motiue. For fo it often happens, That great Princes and States have bin involued in troubles, and that vp with peaces, under the specious name of the publique good, by the passions, designes, or ambitions of their Allyes or Ministers, the canses and pretexts being feldom rightly distinguished.

It hath bin formerly intimated, That Gabor had fecretly treated apart; and now the general peace being concluded, the Articles themselves will most electly discover either to what freits the Prince was driven, or what were his intentions; the order of time giving place to that of Story, we have chosen this period to publish them.

Articles of Peace concluded between the Emperor of Germany, Ferdinand, and Bethlem Gabor Prince of Transylvania, in the moneth of December, 1626.

THe Prince of Transylpania doth promise by the faith of a Christian, neuer to moue arms. or refe any hostility against the Maiesty of the Emperour, or the House of Austria, or their Successors; much lesse to enter into their dominions with an army: Not to aid his Enemies, nor to keep correspondence with them: Not to plot any innovation in the kingdom of Hungary, or other Christian Countries; neither to stirre up and provoke the Turkes or Tartars, or other s to inuade them : Not to entertain nor assist in any euill Counsell against his Maiesty, nor to give ear to the requests and desires of his Enemies; but rather to reveale all their conspiracies and wickednesses which shall be made known conto him, and by all means to demonstrate and sbero a sincere minde, truly desirous of Peace, and solicitous of the Common 200d.

Articles of peace agreed upon between Ferdinand Emperor of Germany, and the grand Signior Sultan Morat, in Comaran. in the moneth of September, 1627.

Sultan Morat, King of Kings, &c. To thee Ferdinand, honored King of the Romans, Almaines, Bohemians, Hungars, Croats, Austrians, Emperor of Germany, and most glorious Prince amone St Christians: sphole last daies be ever happy.

Drevertue of our Imperial Commission granted to Mortela Bassa our magnificent Vizier, ppon the frontiers of Buda; to the Beglerbegh of Agria, Mchemet; to the Mufti of Buda, Isla; to the Sanzack of Strigonium, Achmet; to the Bey of Sonluc, Muharem; to the Aga of Assapi, Ghian; and to Michael Todolaghi Embassador of Bethlem Gabor, on our behalfe: And the illustrous Palatine of Hungary, and the Chancellour Stephano and e others, on the part of the Emperor. Which Commissioners being met in the sield of Sona, and basing found the peaces which had formerly bin concluded at Zit wa, Vienna, Comar, and Chiarman to be diffurbed by diners insolencies and outrages don poon the subjects of both parties. Wherupon the faid Commissioners in the aforesaid place did treat and conclude a good peace for the space of twenty five years, in the current year of our great Prophet Mahomet Multaphathe Messer of God, 1037, and of the Venerable Christ 1627, as appeareth by a sealed Capitulation containing eleven Articles. And you also desiring and accepting the good peace for so long time, having sent the sacred Capitulation to our happy Port, by your esteemed and honored amongst Christians, Stephano Baloco, Captaine of Tata; desiring in your Letter, that it may be observed word for word. Hat seeing the Peace established formerly at Zitwa, Vienna, Comar, and Chiarman, bath remained in the same state, and in the same articles, without any alteration, it shall not be violated by any new occasion of contention.

That the difference of Vatz, whereof is made mention at the present, shall rest in the same state that the Commissioners on both sides shall agree.

That the new Forts built poon the confines of Croatia, contrary to the Peace, Shall be demolished. To which purpose our said Deputy Mehemet, and our Visier Mortesa Bassa, shall meet upon the frontiers of Buda with your Deputies, at the time appointed by the Treaty, and there upon the places on both fiaes shall cause to be demolished the Forts built contrary to the Peace: wherin if they find any impediment, they shall chuse able and valiant men to performe and execute the faid feruice.

That after the approbation of this happy Peace, your great Embassadour shall come to Comar 3 and ours shall repaire with our Imperial Letters to Strigonium; and there one of them adusting the other, yours shall set forward to our happy Port, and ours shall aduance to you. K For joit is agreed by our Imperial Order, both carrying with them the new Imperial Capi-

That all complaints of Villages subject to both parts, shall bee layd aside, and no violences, taxes, or contribution, contrary to our former Convention, shall be exacted. And all Forts built in the common confines shall be rased. And reciprocally it shall be made knowne, according to the antient Treaty, what great men doe dwell amongst our Tributaries. And for the execution of the fixteenth and seventeenth Articles of the Peace of Zitwasthe tenth of Vienna, and the fourth of Comar and Chiarman (for such was then the agreement) two Capigi Bas- L sa's of our high Fort shall be deputed and dispeeded, the one so this fide, and the other to that side of the Danuby. And uponyour part you shall send two such qualified persons to the same places: who being met together with the deputies of Mortesa Bassa and the Palatine of Hungary [ball rectifie all disorders, and see that good justice be done on both parties for so it is our most bigb pleasure.

Thu the Slaues which have been taken during this our Treaty, shall be freed and set at libertie without any ransome: and those who were taken before the said Treaty shall be exchanged and redeemed, according to their qualities and estates; by the interposition of Mottesa Bulla and the Palatine of Hungary deputed for that purpose.

For the good of poor people on both fides, the Commissioners have thought it fit to conclude this renued peace for 25 years, from 1627. Wherunto see have given our Imperial affent.

That all Merchants, and other our subjects on both parts, shall have safe passage and condust through both our Dominions : and we have given command to our Bassa's, Beglerbegs, Generalls, Beghes, and Captaines, upon our confines, to apprehend, bring into justice, and punilb all such as shall any way disturbe or molest them contrary to the peace. As likewise the Palatine of Hungary and other your Ministers shall doe on your part, if they finde any such offendors.

That our Beglerbeghs,Sanzacks,Captains,and Gouernors; and your Generals, Commaunders, and Captaines, shall opon occasion employ all such persons as are louers of the peace and common good.

That there [ball be no damage or hurt done to any of our subjects in any of your Kingdomes or Dominions, neither by sea nor land : as there shall none be done to yours in our Dominions.

That all by-past wrongs, enmities, and vnkindenesses on both parts shall be forgotten and layed asleepe: and that this happy Peace shal be sincerely and sirmely continued and kept inviolate.

Vpon condition that the Emperor performe and observe all the aforesaid Articles, and shat C there follow no action from any Ministers, contrary to the said Peace; We promise and swear by God our Creator, who made the whole world of nothing; and by the honor which we bear toour most high Prophet Mahomet Mustapha, That there shall not bee done during the whole term of the faid Peace, the least hurt or damage to the Subiects, Countries, Kingdomes, Castles, or Forts of the said Emperor, by any of our Ministers or Armies, nor to any Christian Saues SubieEt to our bappy Port.

I have chosen the Capitulations as they were signed by the grand Signior, which though the Articles are very generall, and matters of greatest moment either referred, or not fully established; yet being therfore advantagious for the Turk, who would not descend into particular definition, because by the vertue of former treaties, all places surprised ought to bee testored, and depredations satisfied, he would neither break, nor yet oblige himself to reparation: and indeed the difficulties were infuperable in respect of the Turkish Law, for no place can be furrendred to the Christian, where a Mosche hath been erected; which was the case of Vatz: And the Emperor could not confent to abandon his claime with charitie and honour. grounded on the articles of Zitwa. So that both fides were contented to bee appealed, rather than righted for the time, and both did thinke that they had the advantage: The Emperor, In prefuming his title; the Turke, In not declaring. So the one part accepting the fignature of the other, without dispute, the bodies of the Treaties were very different, if not contrary: yet fodefirous they were of peace, that they did wittingly ouerfee one the arts of the other; and in effect there was no firm peace established, but that either side might finde just matter, and ground it on the Capitulation it selfe when occasion shall inuite them to breake. Therfore I Observe, That it is not the letter but the minde that makes a true peace : and I am persuaded, That the minds of these Princes, how soeuer necessitie hath restrained them, are so discrepant, that the first opportunitie wil discouer them in their own colours and nature. And this sort of conclusion was most fit for Gabor (not to have matters foundly examined and healed) who was principally fafe by an il intelligence, and maintaining of jealousie and snbiect of new difcord between those Empires.

Halil Baffa General of the Army in Afia, whom we left furioufly marching to be reuenged of the Rebel, was forced to rife from the fiege of Arzirum; and retyring, Abaffa followed him 7 days, and cut offall his rear, and took his treasure, cannon, and baggage, to the great discoulagement of the Turkish state. The army afterward fel into mutiny, and sought to stone their

General. Whereupon he wrot to the grand Signior, That there was no hope of obedience, G vnlesse the reuerence of his person did reuiue it. Yet he rested at Tocat, and the soldiers difbanded, and returned naked to the Port, as from an ouerthrow; and it was threatned, that those which did flay with the Vizier, would bring him to Conftantinople perforce ; fo that in the next Spring, much trouble, if not a great desolation was presaged. Yet it was resoluted to prosecute the Warre: for though the renitencie of the soldier, and many other impediments persuaded against it, yet not to have moved at all, was thought too plain a discovery of their owne infirmitic, and would too much encourage the Enemy, especially abaffa Baffa, who had practifed both the Tartars, Poles, and Cossackes. Whereupon Husseruph Bassa Vizier, and late Aga of the lanizaries, was chosen Conductor of the Militia, and fent ouer the water to Asia side with all provision. Much new Ordnance was cast, which the grand Signior H went in person to see in the Founders office. And from thence to the Arsenall, to give order for the gallies. And it was concluded, That the new Generall should march directly to Diarbecher, to oppose the Persian, and there remaine as Bassa of the prouince, with one division of the Army. But secretly he was made great Vizier, and the Seale appointed to bee given him when he should be voon the way. This was done partly to faue charges, because to that great degree appertained great expense in fetting out; and partly for respect of Halil Bassa in Tocat, that he might not feeme to be displaced in difgrace, but that he should surrender to the other, and retyre to the Port, falvo Honore. And when Hufferuph should be declared prime Vizier, he had order alfo to change his wayes, but whither, was not divulged. How focuer it was indged they could not attempt much that year, but only make shew to keep the field, and the

About the fift of April Huffruph Baffa was declared Vizier; who intended to march directly towards Babylon, for of Abaffa they had enough the last year; who had writ a letter to the grand Signior, That he was his feruant and flaue, & would hold the province for him : but if he fought to force more, plainly that he would deliuer the possession to the Persian, against whom as the great Enemy, if they would profecute the war, that he would doe all feruise hee

Whilst the grand Signior was thus busied to settle the affaires of Asia, and to reduce A-K bassa Bassa to obedience; the Tartar Han was openly declared a Rebel, and Enemy to the Turkith Empire : and his brother Shachin Gheray having exacted a tribute of the Princes of Bugdania and Wallachia, had received an overthrow of Cante. Emir a Tartar, his Æmulous, but obedient to the grand Signior. Whereupon it was fuddenly refolued to take Ghian Gheray (formerly deposed) out of the Rhodes, and to send the Captaine Bassa with the whole Armado to establish him Prince, and to displace the other. So that for that year the Mediterran was like to be free, and the Turkish Empire ingaged in somany troubles, that eucrie thing seemed to worke toward their subuersion. But great bodies have strong succations, and die not with one fit, or by one blow; and fuch was the miserie and iniquitie of the times, that while Christian princes contended for ambitious and envious, rather than iust quarels; that L none of them had leifure to help to push down that enemy, who tottered by his own weight; nor to vindicate the Christian Honour; nor the Holy Land, oppressed and possessed by a Tyrant, that onely subsisted by their diffentions : and I feare, the losse of the opportunitie hath lost the Grace that gaue it; and that a common repentance will requite a common sinne and folly.

Having drawn our Historie for matters concerning the Temporal estate, and the revolutions therin, vnto a period, of our own knowledge or practife, it will not be impertinent nor vnprofitable, to make some relation of the Greek Church, and the affaires therof, which suffered many perturbations and affaults during these times; as if one influence had disposed all things to universall trouble : but the causes were far differing. There are yet remaining under M the Patriark of Constantinople 111 Metropolitans and Bishops, who live with freedome of conscience and Religion under the grand Signior, and gouerne the Christian Flocke under their seuerall lurisdictions. Who have their antient Churches, with some competent

A resense in their owne possession, teaching, preaching, and administring of the holy Sacraments according to their owne Rites, without any molestation for matters of Religion. The melent Patriarch is called cyrillan, formerly governing the Sec of Alexandria, a reverend and learned man, who hath defired to reforme many errors, and to enlighten much of the blinderefle of his Church; infensibly prevailing, for want of Lectures, Schooles, and Books, and by the mixture of Barbarisme. His revenue, (though very good) and that of his Bishops, not arifing wholly out of visible lands and rents, but by secret contribution, and other duties; and the simplicity of their life and habit, without shew or pompe, giving no occasion formerly to the Turks, to expect any profit by vexing them, as is viually practifed upon other lay Chriflians, they lived in great peace and tranquility; untill of late yeares the Church of Rome, ho-B ping either by the pouerty of the one, and the greatnesse of the other, to force the Greeks to a submission, or perhaps, envious of their quiet, to weary them by trouble, or to subuert them. To this end a Greeke Colledge was by the last Gregory erected in Rome, to breed up the Youth of that Nation, where they had liberty of all their owne Rites, only acknowledging the supremacy of the Pope, which they must do, or not be admitted : and that ground being lavd, for point of doctrine it matters not; there is enough gained to make him that had fworne obedience, to accept of all the rest. By this foundation the Pope hoped to breed Profelites enow in time to possesse all the Bishoprickes, and to subdue the whole Church. For these Students returned admired men for their education and knowledge, and wanted not meanes to promoue their preferment; which was a great advantage over the ignorant C breeding and discipline of the meere Greeke. But by the forefight and wisedome of Cyrillu this plot taking little effect, as it did irritate the Pope and Catdinals against his person. foir did incite them to feeke other more powerfull meanes of corruption, or to ruine him. And both were put in practife. To this end a Congregation was erected to take care of the Basterne Church, and to direct the practises vpon it; wheteof a principall Gardinall was made Protector ; and many Confistories were held, by which way to reduce the Greeke Church to obedience, or to root out all those that opposed it. It was resolved to make titular Bishops of almost all the Sees (especially in the Islands) where any Greeke Bishop had residence; so that there were many Pastors without a flocke. But these Emissaries being discouered to be supplanters and disturbers of the poor Church, were also resisted, and some cast D into prison; and some ashamed of their empty honour, voluntarily returned. But all these deuises failing, they fell at last upon the round and most assured way of force, to worke their ends by the Embassadors of Christian princes of the Romish Religion residing at Constantinople, and the most potent, of bribery and corruption: making vie of the impotency of the Turkish Ministers, who they knew would sell Mahomet himselfe fot gold : Flettere si neques superes Acheronta mouebo. From this resolution did all the danger and mischiese spring: and certainely the zeale of the Romish Church is cloathed with so much honour and solicitoulines, that in that only it prouoketh enuy. But whether they have in this pursuit and cause proceeded with the rules of Christian charity, in that place, among False-Beleeuers, where euery scandall did concern the honour of Christ himself, or not; I leave to the judgement of B every ingenious man. And because this Part of the quarrels betweene the Roman and Greeke Church, though acted in seuerell yeres, hath beene related entirely by a sincere Pen, in a Letter directed to a noble Senator of Venice, whereby the passages will be more cleere and continuous, than if they had been mingled and interrupted with other affaires; I have rather chosen mine owne ease and the Readers profit, by translating that Letter, to serve it in all at once, than by peeces and fragments. The occasion whereof arising (as I am informed) from the variety of reports and Printed pamphlets, of the last Act concerning the banishment of the Iefuits, and a rumor foread, that they were restored: the truth whereof it seemes that Se. nator did desire to know, and therefore prouoked some Friends to satisfie him. And so without other prejudice, I referre the Reader to the Text it selfe following.

The Copy of a Letter written to a Senator of Venice, concerning the contentions betweene the Roman and Greeke Churches in Con-Cantinople, Harris

Our Letter hath laied woon me a charge, that (if I were able to performe) is so full of enuy, and M. subject to divers consures, according to the preparations of the heavers of a matter of that nature, that I would have chosen to have obeyed you in any other way, rather than in that of a Relator. For I perceine by you, some prejudice is already gone out, and hath taken pollesion of a part of the World, harder to remone than to teach a new beyeste. But hoping that you steke the saturation of your owne eurosity, and that you purpose not to controuers, I will not result, against my owne reason, and listle leifure to returne you affurance bow far you have power over them and me.

T T is now ten moneths finge this conflict between the Greeke Church, and the lefuits here fell out, but not the first time they have been introuble, imprisonment and oblegation, They were settled in Galata by the Gfand Signior's License, under the French protection, about twenty fine yeares fince; in which time they had gotten a good Seat; builded much, gathered together a faire Library, and won greatly voon the weaker Sect, and age, women and children. I speake of the Greeks; forwith the Romanists they had least credit, who adhered to their antient Orders of S. Francis and Dominicke, and were affraid that this new Society would be too butic, and cast them into danger of their old priviledges: for the Turks are plaine, and yet rash, and easily apprehend every innovation.

The pretence of this Colledgewas, To teach children for nothing, or charity, Grammer, the Arts and Tongues. And there being no open Schoole in those parts, and few bookes for want of Printing, the Greekes (who loue learning best, when it is best cheape) were content their children should gleane tares in any field, to saue their purses : and their wives were won by eloquence and affability, to open their fins to them, who had more witty penances than Greekish shrift and fasting, which did decay their beauty, and deject their countenances. But the wifer fort, especially the Patriarch Cyrillus, and his Bishops, discouered Anguem in herba; and did foresee, That by this seeming benefit, the Youth of their Nation might be corrupted (Sernabit odorem testa diu) and their owne bosomes tempted by the Daughters of Ene: And they likewise did feare, That vpon this foundation might be nourished Proselites to Rome, that in time would vndermine the whole Church. And therefore did as modefly as they could (to preuent an open diffention) feeke to withdraw both, from this bait of seducement. Hincilla lachrima : For when the Iesuits did discouer they were discouered, L they began to practife that by force, which they had long defigned in the darke. The first openwarre brake out in February 1 622; when these Fathers (prote aed by the French Embaffador) attempted to depose the Patriarch, and to place another Greeke in his Chayre, who had secretly submitted to the Pope, and promised to render new obedience to the See of Whereupon Cyrillus consulted his friends, how to auoyd their enuy. He resolued to proceed with mildenesse and charity; and first to deale with the seduced Bishop, as one of his owne Flocke: and the Sunday following hee preached and published the Counsels held against him, and the danger of his Church; not naming the Iesuits, otherwise than by admonition, to beware of certaine fiery Organs and Instruments, against whom he should be enfor-M ced to proceed with more seuerity, it they desisted not. And then being assisted with source Archbithops, and the Clergy present, he excommunicated that Greeke joyned with his enemies : hoping by this gentle Exhortation to the one, and Example on the other, to obtaine the bleffing of Peace, recommended by Christ to his Church. The pretence of this quarret from Rome and present distaine, was published by the French Party, to have root, because that the Patriarch kept company with Lutherans and Heretiques, and therefore must needs faugir of the fame Lieuen. This modest course of the Patriarch did but exasperate; for the legits bening a Wifter fit for them, in Aprill following, by subornation of others; did accuse Cirillist of a practicate betray an Island in the * Arches, to the Florentines; and by the pro- "Marches. mile of twenty shouland Dollars for the establishment of the excommunicated Bishop, they gram. ortualled to have the Patriatch apprehended, deposed, and sent prisoner to Rhodes, where he infered many miscries and outrages, and their Friend to be placed in his Scat. But the Greeke Church, though they durst not oppose the present fury, yet they would neither acknowledge Passanem gai non intrauit per Portum, norresort to the Cathedrall, nor contribute any mony, to pay the fine due to the Grand Signior vpon remoue, vpon which the French relvid, for though they had promite from Rome of aid, yet was it not leuied. Whereby final dingthemselves in a freight, they made meanes to a silly Archbishop of Adrianople, who wassich, to take the charge; the other willingly refigning vnto him: who accepted the offer, advanced part of the Symony, and levied the rest by force of Turkish Commands vponthe poore Greeks; and so he was in appearance fully, if not Canonically scated. Their purpose was not long to fuffer this man to continue, but only to hold the See full, vntill supply came from the Pope, and then to depose him, and place one fitted for their designes. By this mutation they hoped to recouer all the Greekes to the Catholique Cause, and Spaine. And in these changes the Patriarchat was robbed of most of the antient Manuscripts, and other Ornaments of the Church.

In September following, Cyrillus by helpe of friends, and force of money, was restored to liberty, and returned to Constantinople. Where being arrived, all the Greekes flocked to him: Which the Archbishop of Adrianople observing, and knowing himselse an Intruder, (the true Patriarch neither refigning, nor being Canonically deprived) secretly and voluntarily came and fubmitted, and offered to futrender the charge to him. But Gyrillus not daring to accept it, untill meanes were made to the State, or that he were recalled by a Synod, was content the Church should be vacant, to see what would of it selfe emerge. The French Embaffador hearing of this suddendesection from him, by the counsell of his lesuits, setched their Archbishop into his house, and encouraged him to resume his place; promising him protection from the Pope, from the King his Master, and to spend forty thousand Dollars for his sustentiation. And thus partly by faire words abusing the impotency, and partly by force compelling him, they won the weake man to yeeld; and then the French Embaffador fent his Interpreters and Ianizaries to re-feat him in the Cathedrall, and in Galata proclaimed him Patriarch, and threatened all those that would not obey and acknowledge him. An insolence full of proportion to the designe, to maintain an ill cause by worse meanes.

But the Clergy and people knowing the value fulnesse of this intrusion, and the vadue consecration, and foreseeing the ruine to come, if so pernitious example should prevaile, did still adhere to their old Pastor. Which the new better weighing in his owne retirednesse, than in the French House, where his ambion was fomented; and fearing that if Cyrillus should recouer his just right by the same way he had done his liberty, some greater disgrace or punishment might fall voon him; without further confulting his high Protector, in the night quitted the See, and came to his Patriarch and cast himselfe into his mercy, asking absolution; and enterty renouncing French, Spanish, or Romane Factions, freely resigned. Herewith Cyrillm encouraged, by the strength of money and friends was againe with the Letters of the Grand Signior restored, in despight of the Enemy, who now found himselfe ouermatched. But this strife did cost the Greeks threescore thousand Dollars, taken at Interest, almost to medestruction of the Church, especially to have discoursed to the Turks away to extort great fums by changes, from them, who formerly were effected poore Monks: which will never be forgotten, and will finally ruine the Sec. This was the effect of pretended zeale to Religion and a Romish charity.

Now all men hoped for Peace; but there brake our another storme. In Ianuary follow-18.4 Coloyre was fent from Rome, called Archemadrita, and was received by the French into his house; who brought a promise from the Congregation de propaganda Fide, That notwithflanding the first faile for want of money, that now twenty thousand Dollars stould be 000000 2

ready and returned thither, if they could make fure the deposition of Cyrillus, and place an obedient Some in his roome. To this end it was promifed that are not opfored. Dollary given by a widow in France to charitable vies, should by the Poperianthorry be converted. And thus new practiles and new accusations, were advanged; but their gimely discovered, they were prevented; yet agains it cost the poore Church a round summer of with the cost.

The next yeare the perfecution was salmed in survard appearance; thought the fibrile and close machinations supplied it: for it was then resolved in Rosses, resolved to the survard appearance; then to discredit him with his friends, and to key him open and windshim? To this purpose were sent from Rome about February: 624, two severall Against one called Pader Berillus, to ingage the Patriarch in a practise with the Cosses, which was treason: and a lestited Greeke bred in the Colledge at Rome; hamed Cannachi Rosse. To whom were given instructions under the hand and scale of Cardinall Bandins; to make obstitute to cyrillus of seconcitiation, with great conditionall promises of supplies and this solvening Commits. Since the supplies and this solvening Commits fion. But Sir, because you will best judge of the scope of this negotiation, by the copy it selfs, the originall under the scale; remaining with the English Embassade, and from whence this hatred tooke root; I, that have onely taken upon me the part of a Relator, have made it here a Parenthesis, and leave your judgement to collect your owner sence;

Non vi essendo lettere ne del Patriarcha,ne de Prelati non le fi può rispondere so non in voce,conformandosi alla relatione del messo.

La chiesa Romana ha sempre desiderata l'unione & pace con tutte le Chiese, spetialmente con l'Orientali, tanto per altri tempi bene merita della Chiesa Catolica, e non solo ne tempi antichi mà vitimamente ancôra, nel tempo de Patriarcha Hieremia ha fato quel che ha potuto per aiutarla, e reunrisela, non perdonando in ciò ne à spese, ne à fatiche, Anzi per questo stelso sine hà sondato. E mantiene il Collegio de giouani Greci con li sui renditi acciò quella natione si nobile & ingegniosa ritorni a siorire in pietà & in lettere, come altre volte ha siorico.

3 Nel particolar proposto del Patriarcha presente: Nostro Seigniore (tanto grandsautore, & Padre della Natione Greca in particolare, come voi stesso sapete, & hauete veduto congli occhi) volentaria mente spenderebbe ogni gran summà di denaro per riunir si nobile membro alla Chiesa, & aiutare in particolare quella sedia dalla quale dipende il rimamente del Oriente; ma supposte le relationi, che di Constantinopoli sono venute, & vengono conti- L novamente del Patriareha, non vede in che maniera si possa fare.

Instructions given to Cannachi Rossi.

Aning neither brought me Letters from the Patriarch, nor from any other Prelate, we cannot give an answer other than by word of mouth, conforming to the relation you have delivered.

The Church of Rome hath alwaies desired an union and peace with all other Churches, but especially wish those of the East, (who have heretofore so well merited of the Catholique Church) and not only in antient times, but even lately in the life of the Patriarch Hieremy, she hath done what she could possible, to assist and unite the Greeke Church unto her enots paring therein either cost or labour; yea, to steet the same, she hath sounded, and doth yet maintaine a Colledge of young Greekes with her ownerements to the end that, that noble and ingenious Nation should stourish in godlinesse and learning; as in some resist bath done.

Concerning the proposition of the present Patriarch, our Lord and Master the Pope (a Fanourer and Father of the Greeke Mation, as particularly your selfs have knowne and seene) would dishurse a round sum of mony to reanite so noble a Member to the Church of Rome, and assist in particular that Sequipon which the rest of the Easterne Churches doe depend. But considering the reports which have been spread and continually do come from Constantinople, of the Patriarch, we do not see in what manner a can possibly be effected.

4 Concerning him, we are aduised, That he denieth the Innocation of Saints, the worship and wene- G ration of Images and reliques of the Saints, the Reall profence of Christin the Eucharist, Free. will, the authoriticof Sacred Councels, and Traditions, the authoritie of Holy Pathers, the necessitie of Auriculas Confession, and init, the renealing of secret sinnes: In sead of which he hash introduced a publike Confes sion made to God in generall words. That he sends young men to study in the English and Germane Academies, where this Doctrine is taught and professed: that by their means he may preadit in the Lenant. And to this end, that he hath caused to be printed, and that he himselfe hath differsad and given to some Bishops, certaine Catechismes full of this and other like cerronique Dollrine, condemned long ago, not only by the Apostilique See, and the Councell of Trent, but even of his owne Predecessors, as he himselfe hath teflified in that Confeson of Faith which he less many yeres fince in the hands of the Archbishop of Leopoli, acknowledging this and the like Dottrine for herefie, and therefore concluding, That it was impofsible that the Greeke Church should ener wnite it selfe with the Protestants. And that in contemplation of the Huzonet Embassadours (with whom he doth freely connerse) he hath taken away the # Sinodicon, an Afferther and bath laid afide the reverence due to the most holy Eucharist.

His Holinesse doth desire. That all these reports were false, and that he being the head of so noble a the power of Nation, should be such a one as the present condition, both in matters spiritual and temporall of the flock cat on, But en under his Iurisdiction doth require; that he might with a cheerfull countenance and safe conscience extend his liberalitie and aid vnto him.

If these shal prove calumnies, and that the Patriarch doth think he can make his innovence appeare before bus Holine fe, let him suftifie himselfe to the French or the Emperors Embassador: to whose relation (being persons of great versue and anthoritie) credit and faith will be given: and by their meanes let 1 him send to his Santtitie the Confession of his Faith, in which he doth accept the Councell of Florence, and condemne the errors of Caluin and Luther condemned alreadie by his Predeceffors. And the Apostolique Sec will not be wanting in all fauour and asistance to raise up the Church of Constantinople, and all others on it depending.

That his Holinessewill not require either of him or the other Prelates of Greece, any conditions but fuch as were concluded and established in the sacred Florentine Councells o that (according as the Grecian Church hath alway done) hee condemne and anathematife the blasphemie of the Septente ionall Heretiques to say, of Caluinists, Lutherans, and such like.

Rome, the xxj. of February, 1625.

Cardinall Bandini.

The place of his Seale.

This Channachi Rossi arriving with his Commission at Constantinople, became an undertaker of his owne accord, to merit of the Church of Rome, to convert the Patriarch who was amased at the boldnesse, and feared both waies seither to answer, and so to be ingaged in a penwarre; or to be filent, and condemned as standing mute. But at last hee resolved, that seeing the Cardinall vouchsased not to write directly to him, to take no notice; but to see how patience would deliuer him out of this fnare. But the Iefuits content with no temper, but present fubscription, stirred vp some Bishops now made of their faction, anew to depose him; and there was offered twenty thousand Dollars to establish one of them. This tempest forced Cyrillus to retyre and hide, vnrill his Friends had reuealed to the State the mysterie of this forked practife, and opened the treacherie of both of these Ministers, imploied only to introduce a change aduantagious to the Pope, and dangerous to the Grand Signior. Yet such is the custome of this Court, that his peace was againe bought at the expence of ten thousand M Dollars.

Once more the Patriarch expected peace and securitie; but the Congregation at Rome fell upon a new counsell: First, better to fortifie themselues before they attempted their enemics. And to this end, vpon divers pretences, it was resolved to send to Constantinople, an A Anti-Patriarch from the Pope, qualified with absolute authority, but under the title of Suffigance Apostolice, and with him a Treasurer for the Church (for Saint Peter durst not trust the French Embassador with money) yet with these to joyne him, for his zeale and countenance, and the lefuits for their Counfell. To this Triumuirate was given all power to plant, difplant, to low, and root out, and finally to do all things that might advance the Romane caule. For their bester Brength &cabetting, it was also decreed to create new Romish Bishops in Smyrna, Nania, and many Islands (a shift learned at Frent) to oppose the Greeks, and by advantage of learning to supplane them. Of this mission there was great expectation.

About December, 1626, the Suffraganco arrived at Naxia, whither the French embaffador fent the Romane Bishop of that place his Chaplein, and two lesuits to receive him: who conducted him as far as Sein, where he was accepted with great Ceremonie. But beginning his office too roughly and sox foon (for he should not have declared himselfe vntill he had crept to Conflantinople vndecthe French wings, and had bin fetled by degrees) many took offence arthis noueltie. The Lay men feared some prejudice in their right of Patronage ouer the Churches: the wifest foresaw the danger of Christian libertie, and that their practices in this innovation would involve all others into a suspicion of some conspiracie; and if any scandall should from hence ariso, the Turks would not diffinguish betweene the guilty and the innocent, beeing in one Liudnie by the name of Frankes. Yea, the Friers could not endure a power foncere aboue them, but refuted him lodging in their Conuents. The Greeke Clergy began enidently to discouer the subnersion of their authority, and antient Faith. Only the Jesuistriumphed, and thought the prize now their owne. But desperation forced some, and charity others to defend their possessions. Thus encouraged by strong friends to oppose this fatall blow, all the plot was opened to the Vizier, and their defign quietly and without scandal fru-Arated. The Suffraganco retired without noise; their new Bishops made by subreptitious Licences were imprisoned, their Letters of Priviledge taken from them, to the extreme anguish and dilgrace of their Protector. This last repulse made them furious; but Infestis animis deerat

In lune, 1627, here arrived voon an English ship one Nicodemo Mataxa, a Coloyre borne in Cephalonia:he brought with him the Greek stamp made at his expence, and divers bookes printed in London, as he pretended, for the benefit of his Nation, drowned almost in inuincibleignorance, especially for want of means to learn and study. As soon as he came ashore, and had spoken with the Patriarch, and made knowne his zeale to that Church, hee was from him by the Archbishop of Corinth recommended to the English Embassador, to assist this pious intention, to passe these heavy commodities through the Custome house without suspition. Inwhich though he forefaw some trouble, yet he willingly undertook the protection. But first consulting with Cyrillus of Constantinople, and Gelasius Patriarch of Alexandria, (then for his private affairs at the Port) and with the Resident of the united Provinces, he was of opinion, That in a matter of that nature, which was in it felfe honest and instifiable, it was requisite to proceed openly, and with leave: which having obtained of the Vizier tooke vp, and brought both stampe and Bookes to his house. Now supposing all the difficultie had been our come. sand neuer suspecting any scandall from Christians, for that which hee thought did not, nor ought not to offend them, hee gaue countenance and helpe to Maiaxa to put his industry in

The Patriarch desired the Stamp might worke in the English House; but the Embassador for private respects would not consent, but offered to take a House, and to give both it and them his protection. Which he did, not far from his owne, and neerer to the French Embafsadors:who pretending the vnion of the two Churches, there appeared no feare of him, that he should enuy a Christian worke, or do any act that might separate them for cuer. As soone as Mataxa was feeled, and his print in order, the French and the lefuits tooke offence at it, as fee vp to publish Bookes against the Church of Rome, or at least to take away their trade of teaching, and seducing children by his printing of catechisms, Magna est Diana Ephesiorum, First, they attempted to draw him into their government, inviting him to their Monasterie, intimating, That adhering to them would take off some ill suspition raised on him for having studied in England. When he could not be woon by flatteries, they reported him to be an Heretique and a Lutheran, because he took fanctuarie from the English. Against the stamp they excepted, at the Armes of the King of Great Britain, which they faid was scandalous, and being in the Frontispecce of eucry Booke, was malum augurium, and did foreshew, that within they must sauor of heresie: for, VV hat could be expected from an heretical! Fountain, or from the Man that conversed with Heretiques.

These obloquies little moued the English Embassador, who knew their malice proceeded from the matter of one Author that wrote against the Supremacie. But the rage extended so far, that it was reuealed to Mataxa, That he should be murthered in his bed, or in the street, as he passed in the night from the English to his owne house. Whereupon at his great inflance the Embassador was content for his person to give him lodging. So in the day he continued his worke, and at evening retyred under protection.

As yet they found no occasion to worke their purpose: but the Patriarch sent a little Treatife to the Presse, made by himself (being an exposition of the Faith, and Tenets of the Greek church, without any mention of controuerfie, or cenfuring the opinions of others; principally to satisfie the world in those calumnies spred, That he had introduced new Doctrines, to the scandall of his own Flocke) which he had resolued to dedicate to the King of England , but now having opportunitie to print at home, prepared an Epistle fit for it. This prouoked the Iesuites, who not able to endure any application of the East Church to that Monarch, could no longer contains themselves, but conspired with their Embassadors to overthrow both the Author, Worke, and Workman: and having gotten another Booke written by the Patriarch. printed in England, and brought by Matana against the lews, they found some passages which did modefily condemne the opinions of the Turks. When they had this supposed advantage, they practifed with a Buffone, but a crafty knaue, who had credit with the Vizier, and had bin Vayuod of Galata, to inform him, That this Maiaxawas a Captain fent hither to raife sedition, and that under the colour of printing Bookes for children, bee dispersed others against the Alcaron, That they were brought from England fecretly, and that the English Embassador protected him and his designes: That these Bookes were written by the Patriarch, to stir the Greeks, and to draw them into defection; and many of them fent to the Coffacks, to prouoke them to vnite vpon the occasion of the Grand Signiors expedition into Asia, that was then

These accusations were capitall, as they concerned Cyrillus and Mataxa; and sufficient to impaire the credit of the English Embassador, if not to ruine him in the affairs for which he

The Vizier without further confideration resoluted to assault the house of Mataxa, and surprise him in the act of Sin, of printing against their Law; and gaue order to a Captaine and companie of Ianizaries to execute it. Which was out of course, to set at liberty vnruly soldiers, that seldome containe themselues within their Order, or can be appealed without booty. The exploit should have bin done on Friday the fourth of Ianuarie: but the French Embassador hearing the English had inuited the Patriarch, & Venetian Baylo, to some entertainment on the day of Epiphanie, he stayd it two daies, as he said, to make sauce to their Feast. On that day at high noone, a hundred and fifty Ianizaries armed befet Mataxa's house, and guarded all the passages to the English: all was full of sears and rumor, and no man knew the cause. In this tumult, the English Embassadors Secretarie and Mataxa returning from Church at Galata, passed by; and some of the Coloyres servants that were apprehended, shewed their Master, to free themselues: but he being in a hat, and the Secretarie answering he was one of his Lords Followers, he escaped safely, and got into the English house. The Captaine missing him the Principall, bound all his servants, brake open his chests, and carried all away, stamp, books, papers, plate, mony, cloths, and what soeuer was portable, as the goods of a traitor, to the value of *Interpreter. feuen thousand Dollars. And returning thus full, a French * Drogaman told them, That the Offendor was fled to the English Embassador: but the Turk, that had more charity, answered, he had no order to follow him thither.

Now the English Embassador thought himselse interessed; yet that day not to seeme to M bee moued, made as merry as such rumours would beare; That hee had practifed against the State; others, That the Stampe was to counterscit the Grand Signiors Letters; others, To makefalse money; and other such as Ignorance and Accusation beget among the Multitude.

The next day the books were examined by two Greek Renegado's, and the Folio by the Iefuits noted where the blasphemy should be: the place was interpreted before the Vizier and fome * Mulla's, but there was nothing found that by law could touch the life of the author or * Churchmen minter; yet the Patriark was convented, and many crimes objected to him without proof or and Lawyers. probabilitie.

There yet rested some dissidence in the Vizier, at the report, That Mataxa was a man of war. and held correspondence with the Cossacks, and that he should live under the English prote-Aion; which was nourished by shewing the Armes of England on the frontis-piece of that book. But when the Musti had given sentence, That every doctrine against their opinions was not blasphemy, nor criminal; and that the grand Signior giving leave to Christians to R teach their own law, and to preach matters contrary to Mahometism, it could not be thought but it was daily don in their Churches, for which they were not punishable; so they could not beculpable of treason for writing the same, so long as they did not scandal their Law, but onlyoppose it. The main objection being thus fallen, it was more easie to refell the accessaries grounded voon it.

The third day the English Embassadour shewed himselse openly, and went to the Vizier. and professed, That he had received that Mataxa into his house, to keepe him from the fury: but that he should be ready to maintain his innocencie. He put him in mind, That this businesseand man accused he himselse knew, that hee was a Gentleman of Coloyre, a subject of the Senat, and presented vnto him by the Venice Baylo; and that he had given scaue to land and viethe stamp, and that nothing was done without his communication and confent: That therefore he much admired that he would be so rash to suspect his friends, and so scandaloufly to affault their houses, to spoile their goods at the instigation of those whom hee had caule to know for enemies; and to be so far transported at the winde of an occasion, withour acquainting him, to fend fouldiors that might have done mischiese to bee too late repented.

When the Visier had called to minde the man, and all circumstances, and remembred whom the matter concerned (the English Embassador, with whom he had considence) hee was ashamed of his precipitation, and protested he had no doubt of him, nor purpose to affront him: That hee wondered at the impudence of those that had so groffely abused him; and D concluded with this profession (as the English Embassador for his credit did publish) That if against his will he had done him wrong, when he should see all the goods of Mataxa restored, their honour repaired, and those that had procured this scandall, fallen into the snare they had made for others, and exemplarily punished, then hee defired to be acquitted of injustice, and to be esteemed still his true friend. By this office the Patriarch was wholly cleared, and restored to the good opinion of the Vizier, and afterward of the Musti, to whom the English went immediatly, to instruct him of the malice of the one part, and innocencie of the other.

Within few daies, the Vizier fent home to the Embassadors house all the stamp and print. (except some few letters lost in the tumult) and all the books and papers that were seised, in publique fatisfaction, attended with Officers and fouldiers: in which he shewed so much respect and care to recouer every particular, that there was not much missing of any value. A. mongst rhuse books, there was printed Bishop Iewels Apologic translated into Greeke, a Catechisme and Confession of the Patriarch, and some new Treatises at the Presse; but one, and one only lewel was missed, and can neuer be recourred: There was presented to the English Embassador a Manuscript that had with great veneration and care bin preserved in the libra-Tyof a Bishop, and was averred and beleeved the only copy in the world, of the Lectures and controugraties against the Bishop and Church of Rome; read cathedrally by the most famous and learned Photism Patriarch of Constantinople. This booke the Embassador highly estecmingas the raritie of the East, had deliuered to Mataxa, to be transcribed by his Deacons that attended the correction of the print; that having double copies, fo great a riches might not perish in one bottom. But this too much care to faue it, lost it : for beeing halfe finished, and in the affault of the Ianizaries among it other furprised, neither the original nor any leafe could ever be recovered. Such was the diligence of the fetters and overfeers of this conspiracie. The Embassador mooned the Visier, who vsed all his power: the Patriarch published G an Excommunication for many moneths, if perchance any Greek had bought it of the souldiers, to return it: but all in vain. Wherby it was reasonably concluded, That this book was a principal envy of the Iesuits, who seared the publication; and that their ministers beeing Spies and in part Actors of the assault, had so especiall an eye upon it, that it sel into their unredeemable power, and so by them either sent to Purgatorie or the Vatican.

The next day after the fury, Cannachi Ross the Agent of Cardinall Bandini, went to the Patriarch to braue him in advertitie: who mildly asking him, How long they would tempt his patience by wicked conspiracies? and, What had driven them to this extremitie to seek his life? he replied, That they were scandalised at him for two things; for savouring Mataxa, and suffering him to preach, being an heretike, and living in the house of an heretique. Secondly, H That he had begun to print a book ful of heresies, dedicated to the King of England the head of Heretiques. But if he would retract the one and renounce the other, the French Embassia.

With the next Post after this trouble, there came from Rome a copy of a Consistory held in the house of Cardinal Bandini, entituled for Constantinople; wherin this practise against the Patriark was debated and resolued: the cause grounded upon his convertation with Calvinists, and sending of students to be brought up in their Schooles; that therfore he should be accused of contribuing an insurrection against the Ottoman empire. And the execution of this plot commended to the Embassadors of the Potentates residing in this Court, saucres of the Catholique cause. Which Councel being compared with the last practise, it did evidently I appear, that one was dependant on the other. Which the Patriarch wel considering, and sing that he had no more safety in patience, resolved to vie his friends, to send them away that would not let him live in peace. And the English Embassador taking deep offence at the insolvence of Cannachi Rossi, vied to the name of his king; it is thought that they, together with the help of a good friend no lesse powerful than either of them, united to banish the Iesuites; and to shew their Protector, that they had no lesse power to offend, because they had lesse and desire to do it.

For the way they wrought (to omit other observable circumstances) it is true, the English Embaffador was angry, and declared, and had good credit, and was feen often abroad : but hee was not alone, for the Patriark (that is a wife man) knew he striued not now fonvictory, but for K life. The Icsuits guilty of deseruing a iust reuenge, retyred all to the French Embassador his house, where they lay hid about fourteen daies: but in that time hearing no noise, and hoping that all was secure, and that the Patriark and English Embassador travelled onely in their defence, and to recouer their losses, they returned to their house triumphant; when suddenly we heard that a messenger came to them, to let them know that some Greeke women were come to make confession, and stayed for them in their garden. To whom two of them came downe, and were presently arested by the Viziers officers, who then entred their lodgings and apprehended another. This was done without any noise or scandall, and the actors had such care, That their Church was fealed, all their altars and plate faued, and what soeuer appertained to them, inviolated : only their persons and Library, per Legem Talionis, were caried to the Visiers L house, where they were kept in irons about a moneth, and their bookes likewise visited; in which were found much more advantage to have drawne them within compasse of the Turkish law, than their discouerie on the Patriark. And the same instant Cannachi Rossi was also taken and his papers in his lodging, and caried to bear them fad company. The French Embassador desired audience, but could not obtain it: he visited euery great mans port, especially the Musti, where he had no other acceptance, than admonition to carry himself with more temper, and to meddle with the busines for which he was imploied. Hee vsed all meanes, but could no where preuail for relief: he threatned a breach of antitie, and to furrender the Capitulations, and interdicted the Traffique; but the Turkes were prouided with answers, That they would inform his mafter the French King, and give him fatisfaction. In conclusion, the M Ichuites weary, and in feare of death (for there was crime enough) the English Embassador, whom they supposed their Enemy, to avoid scandall and the effusion of Christian bloud, interposed for them, and obtained their lives; and after many Consultations, it was agreed to

A banish their Orderout of all the grand Signiors dominions, to deliuer back their books: and this grace at the intercession of him, of whom they had not merited that courtesie. That it might clearly appear there was no purpose of robbery, nor to take the goods that were innocent, and in the French Kings protection. In profecution of which Councel there were commands sent to Scio, Smyrna, Aleppo, and Cyprus, to discharge those places from the practise of this fraternitie; who had a design to get the Sepulchre at lerusalem into their hands, and to fundant the Franciscans (which controuersie is wel known at Rome, and would make a long Section in this narration:) and finally they were put into a Barque, with good gard, in their irons, and fent to Scio; with order to thip them and their fellowes upon the next veffell that went for Christendome, and in the mean time to keep them prisoners. When they came to R thecastles on the Hellespont, the French Embassadour had procured, that the Castellane would not suffer them to passe, for want of the Captain Bassa's Letter; and so they were returned to Constantinople, but still kept in their Gaol: and suddenly it was rumored, they were revoked, and should be re-established. But when the Vizier heard his authoritie was contemned, and this trick put vpon him, he was fo much inraged, that again their lines were in danger. But the present fury appealed even by their supposed Enemie, they were returned, banithed first to Scio, and so shipt for Italy. I must confesse that I have not observed any one forry but the Prench Embassador, scarce his houshold; all other Catholiques, especially the Orders of Friers, and the Franciscans of Icrusalem, were glad they were eased of their Dominion and the fears of their designes. And I have heard it reported. That themselves did ingeniously confesse an obligation to the English Embassadour; and in their relations to Rome laid all the fault upon the precipitation of their Protector.

There was another command fent to Smyrna, to apprehend a couple that had erept in vnderthe French Confuls protection who at first hid themselves; but being adulted to give place, and a means opened to them to escape, fled secretly; there beeing no other purpose in their persecutors, but to be rid of such negotiating fathers,

And thus S^r you have a true relation of what I have observed, & for your satisfaction collected of those that had better means to know particulars than I who am busine enough if I do myne own businesse. There resis only to tell you, That during the English Embassadors stay (which was about sine months after) the French sate down and stirred not. But considering that his credit in France depended much from Rome, and from an opinion of his zeale to the Catholique cause, and his power to support it; having made the Colledge of Cardinals beleue that he would subdue the Greek Church (wherein wise men thought hee did dissente both to the Cause and his Masser: for the ready way to undoe the Catholiques, was to innovate any thing in their antient maner of life, government, and priviledges, which they enjoyed with their consciences freely) he thought himselfevtterly lost, if he did not do somewhat to recover his reputation there, by a seeming restitution of the Icsuites. Vponwhich deliberation, having yet two of them resuged to his house, and his there a month after the departure of the English embassador; he petitioned the grand Signior, That his Chapleins might have leave to bury his Dead, and do other offices of their Function. Which being granted, it was published. That he had restored the Icsuites.

And because you are so curious to know all, and in what estate that restitution now stands, I conclude with the true copy of the command obtained, and leave it to your judgment, whether the breach be made up so whole as is supposed. For every plaister is not a sound cure.

The

The Grand Signiors Command, directed to Affan Bassa Captaine of the Sea ; and to the Caddee of Galata.

Tthe fight of this our high and Imperial Signature, you shal take notice, That the French A Embassador by an * Arz given to our happy Port, hath made us to vinder stand, That (their Law and Religion being not like to that of other Christians which live in our wel gouerned Empire) they with our Imperial Licence did procure to come from the kingdome of H France certain Religious men called fesuites, who for the space of twenty five years have had their abode in the Church of Saint Benet appointed to them in Galata; and lately by finister information made against them, were sent away to their owne countrey: from which time the laid Church being fout pp, and having no other Religious who could afift in the necessary Offices of men ready to die, or dead; have therfore petitioned for our noble Command. To which end (excepting alway the aboue named * Religious, fent away, and others of other Natitheran Order, ons) that he may place in the faid Church fuch persons of Religious French, and French Reheion, which are found at this present here, elect, and appointed by him, without molestation 1 or injury to be done onto them by any whomsoever. Therefore in conformitie to bis request. this my Command is obtained; and I doe command, That at the fight of this my Imperial Order it be obeyed and executed : That because, as is before pretended, the French baue not those * Religious who can performe the Functions necessary for the Dead (excepting alway those Religious already banished, and all others comming from the countries of our Enemies) that they may put into the faid Church such persons for Religious men, as are natural Frenchmen, and of their owne Nation, which at present are found in Galata, and that shall by them bee appointed: and that so long as they commit no faults in their charge and that they practise nothing contrary to our Imperial will that they be of no man molested.

> Vison the obtaining of this Command, the two Issuits in the French house were solemnly and with great oftentation caried to S. Benetto's Church, and placed there as the Embaffadors Chapleins, and an opinion spread, of an absolute re-establishment of their Order, and so it was divulged in Rome. But it was not supposed by the French, that this Copy should bee feene by any but himfelfe; and then the A& would have appeared as truth. But some Criticall and captious men have made many Quare's upon this matter: First they have asked, What then is the French Religion, if it differ from all other Christians in the Grand Signiois Dominions; when in Galata there were fine Romish Churches and Monasteries, with French Capuchins, Dominicans, Franciscans, and others? Secondly they have asked, What Ceremonies are necessarie to a Frenchman, in danger of death, or after it, that none of these Orders can affift or performe? Again they aske, Who are restored by this priviledge, if the Religiosi supra nominati, and Strangers are excepted ? What is meant by French Religion, and the same Religion? Towhich it is answered first, That this new French Religion is onely Iefuitical, not approued by the most Christian King, improoued by the Sorbons, and reproued by all the louers of the libertie of the Gallican Church. To the fecond, That they dying must be absolued only by a Icsuite, or buried in his habit, or shut our of Paradice. Again they answer, They finde none reftored but a new French Religion, and such men as were personally M then in Galata; that is, two Chapleins only to affish in case of death, but no Order of Iesuits. And they finally conclude, That the French Embassador hath more dishonoured his nation, to restraine their Religion to the Iesuites, and the whole Clergy, to renounce all other

A Orders, that he hath done benefit to the lefuites, except he had need of some colour in stead

Though

Though imperciment to the Hillory of Tunky, yet a conflict hapting between either hip G which transported Sit Thuman above to Italy (neumning from Conflantinople) is the gallies of Make; I have thought it would not hear vaganteful conclusion, to observe and tecord the mighty delineance of those whom God is picased to keep; by communicating the copy of a relation made of that fight.

On the eleventh of August, about ten of the Clocke in the forenoone, the Samplan beeing becalmed before Malta, the fears fmoother glaffe, not a breath of winde, wee diffeourred foure Gallies 20 rowe framahe Towne. They came up all abreft, right with the flare-boord quarter of our thip , which warned as to fit our failes and our felnes to fight, not knowing their purpose. When they came neere, the Admirall Galley, without fending boat, or free. king with us made a thor, which fell thort then rowing neerer, made another which did at. H most reach vs. And comming still on the Vice Admiral game a third, all demy Camon that flew ouer vs between our matts. Thefewe improfed they made to try the length of their ord. nance, and to lie there for battery; for they flopped and piked halfe their ones. Wherem. convection them a Culverin thou that grazed under the Admiralla flarre boord how and to we began a tharpe fight betweene twelue and one. The Gallies were full of Causelierthe and fouldiers as they could fland: They lay on that quarter about three houres, changing shotwithvs, often hitting one the other. Then Captaine William Rainsborow (who behaved himselfewith brane courage and remper) finding a breath of winde to give the (hipmorion : confidering that he was a great marke on the broad fide, and the Gallies very narrow keeping their prowes tharpe seward him, and that he could beare little upon them, trimmed his failer I before the winde, and brought them to a Scene fight, where they continued their barrerie two houres more, and the Sampson could then beare upon them two whole Culverin in her Sterne Chafe, and two transform Culverins in the Gunne-mome and two Sakers in the print Cabbin; and by yawing of either fide both her quanters, and fome pieces forward on : This gauled them, and they found it hot. Their manner of fightwas, when they were all laden. they rowed up, and brought all the malle of our Ship rogether, and then game all their guns; having fired, they fellatherne; and this in order, Abernii vicibus: but yet we reached them The Admirall of the Gallies pane eight Pieces at once, so that the appeared all fire arms demy-Cannon of twenty fine pound buller, two demy-Culverin, fine Saker and Minion. All the refluctealike armed, and they plyed their Ordinance very hard, and often dangerous & fly. Being afterneat first, they shot at the maste and wards of our ship, and maimed them almost all in a line; hoping to see some fall, and then they had layne by vs. But it was so calmethat the mafts finained not, though they were almost spoyled. The Gallies kept a man on the end of their after most Gare, to absence where their shot fel and fent boats often off, of which operaturned well-withed. About fine a clocke they paufed, and the Admirall fent to his fleet, whereupon they tooke a refolution either to boord, diffnay, or linke vs; and came up on our larboard quarterallabreft, within piffoll (hor, and their fwords drawne, and Trumpets founding a bidding vs Amaine for Malta. The Captaine caused one from the prope towast them aboud, and answered a point of Warre. Then began an hot fight, and too hot for them ; for the Samplin forbare, and game them not a flot vntil they were very neer, L. and almost under se, and then poused in two Culverin, and two demy-Culverin, and one Sakerwith a round thou and a cafe, that saked them fore and aft; and they having given vs all their Gunnes together, began to fall againeafterne. But weetacked and fent them abroad fideat parting ; and fo they lay and renewed their Sterne batterie vntill Sunne-fet. What blowes we received is in a note following: What harme the Enemie received we knew not; only this we faw, the Admirals foremathwas thou by boord, his poop caried away into the fea, one culverin round that and cale that fel in the how, and went out in the quarter thorow the banks of Rowers and many other that raked them through. The Admiral lay athwart a good space to men forwhat, & let mendown her fides in baskets; and neuer came more up: for that that that brake out her poup, made them all at once take in their flags; which being an viu- M fuall thing, we conjectured that their Generall was flaine. And fo they left vs, and hoyling their failes, and rawing, made all hafte into their port, in fight whereof they fought. The latt that they made came into the gun roome of the Sampfon the force being spent, yet hunt three

A men: and the having a Culverin laden, fent it to take leave of them; which raked the Admirall. When they came up with vs, they did not expect fuelibullets, but hoped to batter us to the water out of our flor. They left vs at halfe home past fix a clocke, fo that the fight lasted fenen houses. The Gallies gave the Sampfor 400 fhot, and hit her in the hull, maffs, yards, or rigging, with more than a hundred and twenty; and we flor fifty fix whole Culverin, & frent in all about tembatic sof pouder. Never Gallies had so much advantage of a time, nor did fo branely, but they were at their own dores. By Gods grace we had but one man a paffenger flain four hurt, and fome hruifed; but our thip terribly battered, her malts, yards, failes, and sopes all torn. That night continued with little winde, and the featmooth, and wee plugged vpour wounds the best we could. The next day we were inforced to stand out of the way to Southward of the Island Lampadosa, when we found our danger; and there we lay fine daics without fail, so fifth our malts and yands, and mend our failes, and to make firme our breaches by and under water. Which we could not have don if it had not continued calme; for those demy cannon bullets of twenty frue pounds made too great holes, and split all plankes and timbers and the Carpetter was forced to hang like a Tortoife vpon the water, and drine masymiles vinder the fending of the fea, washing him oner contimully; eight shoteither with or within three fingers of the water. So if that night or the new day there had bit any feative had never made this Relation, for the pumpes of our thin were as well exercised as the men. But God helpedys.

A briefe Discourse of the greatnesse of the Turkish Empire: As also wherein the greatest strength thereof consisteth: And of what power the bordering Princes, as well Mahemetane as Chris flians, are in comparison of it.

By RICHARD KNOLLES.

2. Secretile Hillory of the Turks (being indeed nothing elfe but the true Record of the wofull ruines of the greater part of the Christian Commonwealc) thus as before panea mrougen, and as response to the pressent as a proud Characteristic (of all others now upon earth far the greatest) as a proud Characteristic models are the models are the state of thus as before passed through, and at length brought to assend; and their pion ftill flanding up as it were in defiance of the whole world: I thought it good for the conclusion of this my Labour, to propose vnto the view of the realous Christian, the greatnesse thereof, and so necessed could to fet down the bounds and limits within the which it is (by the goodneffe of God) as yet contained together with the firength and power thereof, analfo in what regard it hash the neighbor princes bordering or confining upon it; with fomeother particularities rending to the same purpose. All or the most part therofalthough it be by the Considerat wel to be gathered out of the whole course of the history before going, yet shall it more plainly here together in the ful therof appear, than by the long and particular confideration of the rifing and increase thereof be perceived; not much whike the overgrown tree, at the greatnesse whereof enery man wondereth, no man in the meane time either perceining or marking, how by little and little in track of time it grew up to that bignes, as now to ouertop at the rest of the wood. The Imperial lear of this to dreadful an empire, is the most famous city of Constantinople, fometime the glory of the Greeke Empire, but now the place where dehmat the first of that same and fourteenth of the Orlonno Emperors, acknowledging no manlike himfelfe, triumpheth oner many nations; a city fatally founded to command, and by the great Conqueror Tameriam of all others thought to be the best seated for the Empire of the world. In which ciby (taken from the Turks by Mahamet the second, by the Turks syrnamed the Great and the Greeke Empire by him subverted) as the Othomore Emperours have ever since seated themschee fo have they wonderfully, even to the astonishment of the World, out of the ruines of that for closions a State increased both their strength and empire, almost also gether fire even in the felfe fame kingdoms, countries, and regions, as were fortimes that; shough not as yet (God be thanked) able to attain to the vitermost bounds that that empire fometimes had, e. specially in Europ, abeie that it hath oftentimes in pridetherof most mightily sweln, and in fome few places thereof formwhat also exceeded the fame. Among the reft of the Othermeenperors, this great Monarch of whom we speak (namely Achmus the first, which now reigner is in that most spacely and Imperial city) hath at this present under his command and Empire, the chiefeand moff irmitful parts of the three first known parts of the world : onely America remaining free from him, not more happy in the rich mines therof, than in that it is fo far from The ham out of his reach. for in Europhee hath all the fea coall, from the confiner of Enidarms (the the Intelligence of the Confiner of the the Intelligence of the Intellige vitemost bound of his Empire in Europe Westward) vitto the mouth of the river Tanais, in nowcalled Dog, with whatfoener lieth betwint Budain Hungary, and the Imperial City of Configurinople: in which ipace is comprehended the better part of all Hungary, all Bofne. Servia, Bulgaria, with a great part of Dalmatia, Epirus, Macedonia, Grecia, Peloponefus, Thracia, the Archipelago, with the rich Islands contained therin. In Africahe pestelleth all

Merfalcabit, Melilla, Oran, and Pennon and from Alexandria Mendous of Aina, called of old Scine, Southward in which force are constituted the famous Singdomes of Tremizen, Algiers, Tunes, and Agypt, with diners other great Cities and Provinces. In Alia all is his from the itreits of Hellespontus Wellward, vnto the great city of Tapris Eastward: and from Derbent neer unto the Cafpian Sea Monthward, unto Admin upon the Calfe of Arabia Southward. The greatnesse of this his Empire may the better the conceined by the greatn. fle of fome parts thereof: the Meere of Meotis, which is all at the Turkith Emperors command, being incompatien thousand miles ; and the Funne of Black. See in circuit two H thousand and seuen hundred ; and the Medineumann coast which is subject was him containing in compaffe about eight thousand miles. But to speake of his whole territory together, he goeth in his owne dominion from Lauris to Buda, about three thousand two himdred miles. The like diffance is from Derbent vnto Adena. From Balfers vnon the Perform Gulfe vnto Tremifena in Barbarie, are accounted firete leffe than foure thouland miles. Her bath alfo in the Seathernord noble Islands of Cypres, Enhous, States, Chios, Lesbos and others of the Archipelago. In this foliage and spacious and impire are consumed many great and large countries, formetime most famous Kingdomes, abounding with all manner of worldly bleffings and natures flore: For what Kingdome or commercy is more finitfull than Agypt, Syria, and a great part of Afia : What countrey more wealthfull or more plentifull I of all good things, thanwas fometime Hungarie, Grecia, and Thracia? In which countries the forrechief he hathalfo many rich and famous Cities, but especially some, which bee of greatest wealth in the Tarks and trade; namely Constantinople, Caire, Aleppo, and Tauris, Constantinople for multitude of people exceedeth all the Civies of Europe, wherein are deemed to be about feuenhundred thouland men, which if it be fo, is almost equall to swo fuch Cities as Paris in France. Aleppo is the greatest City of Syria, and as it were the centre whereauto all the merchandise of Alia repaire. Tauris of late the Royall feat of the Perlian Kings and one of the greatest Cities of that Kingdome, from whom it was in this our agetaken by amurath the third, bath in it aboue two hundred thousand men. Caire among stall the Ciries of Africa is the chief leauing all others farre behinde it (although that fome make the City of Canoequall vino it in g greatnesse) beeing as it were the stone-house not of Agyptonely, and of agreet part of Africa, but of Indiaalfo; the riches whereof being brought by the Red Sea to Sues, and from thence upon Camels to Caire, and fo downe the riner Nilus to Alexandria, are thence difperfed into these Westerne parts: albeit that this rich trade bath of lare time been much impaired, and so like more to be; the Christians (especially the Portugals) traffiguing into the East-Indies, and by the sast Ocean transporting the zich commodities of those Easterne Countries into the Well, to the great hinderance of the Grand Signiorhis cultomes in Caire.

The Otherangouernment in this his fo greatan empire is altrogether like the gonernment of the Matter over his flane, and indeed morre typannicall for the great Sultan is for blolute a L' Lord of all things within the compatite of his compire that all his fubicits and people, be they neuer fo great, docall themselves his slaves, and not his subjects : neither hathany man power ouer himselfe, much lesse is hee Lord of the housewherein hee dwelleth, or of the land which hee tilleth, except some few families in Constantinople, towhom some few such things were by way of reward, and upon effectial fauor ginen by Mahamet the fecond, at fach time as hee won the same. Neither is any man in that compine so great, or yet so far in sauor with the great Sultan, as that he can allow himselse of his life, much lesse of his present fortune or state, louger than it pleafeth the Sultan. In which foab folime a fone mignty (by any free borne people not to be endured) the tyrant preferreth himselfeby two most specials means; first, by taking off all armes from his manuall subjects, and then by punting the same and all things else con-M cerning the flate and government thereof into the hands of the Apoflata or Renegate Chriftians, whom for most part, energe third, fourth, or life yeare for oftner if his need fo require) heeraketh in their childehood from their miserable parents as his tenths or tribute children.

A Whereby he gaineth two guarcommodicies: first, for that in so doing he fue plathethe Proninces, hee most feateth, of the floure, finues, and flrength of the people; chelice being still made of the ftrongest youths, and fittest forwar: then, for these with these as with his owne creatures he asmeth himfelfe, and by them affureth his flase; for they in their childehood traken from their parents laps, and delivered in charge to one or other appointed for that purnoie, quickly and before they be aware become Mahometans wand to no more acknowledging father or mother, depend wholly on the great Sultan who to make who of them, both feeds them and foffers them, at whose hands onely they looke for all things, and whom alone they thanke for all. Of which fry fo taken from their Christian pasening the only feminarie of hiswars) fome become horimen, fome footmen, and foun time the greatest Commanders of in his flate and Empirenest voto himfelfe; the naturall Torks in the meane time giving them. selues wholly vito the trade of merchandise, and other their mechanical occupations; or elle to the feeding of cattell, their most antient and naturall vocation, not incomed ing at all with matters of gonernment or flate. So that if vitto thefe his fouldiers, attof the Christian sace; on iownealfo his fleet and mony, you have as it were the whole fluength of his Empire : for inchese foure, his horsemen, his footmen, his theer and money, especially consisteth his great force and power: whereof to fpeake more particularly, and first concerning his money: It is commonly thought, that his ordinary revenue exceedeth noteight millions of gold:and albeit that it might feeme, that he might of fo large an Empire receine a far greater reneme. ver doth lice not, for that both hee and his men of warre (in whose power all things are) have The Turks with h their prestell and almost onely care upon armes, fitter by nature to wast and destroy countries, than to preferue and enrich them: infomuch that for the preferuation of their armies, and furtherance of their expeditions (every years to do) they most grienously spoyle even their own people and Provinces whereby they paffe, scarce leaving them note flaties wherewith to line: fo that the subjects despairing to enjoy the fruits of the carth, much leffe the riches which by their industrie and labour they might get vato themselves, do now the furtherendessour themselves either to husbandrie or trassique than they needs must, yea, than very necessity it selfe inforceth them. For to what end anaileth it to sow that another man must reape yor to respect hat which another man is ready to desoure ? Whereupon it commeth, that in the territories of the Othoman countrey, yea cuen in the most fruitfull countries D of Macedonia and Greece are seen great forrests, all every where walt, few cities well peopled, and the greatest part of those countries lying desolate and desart: so that husbandry (in all well ordered commonweales the Princes greatest store) decaying the earth neither yeeklesh her increase with the painefull husbandman, neither the matter with the astificer, we there the artificer wares to furnish the Merchant with, all together with the plough running insorning and decay. As for the trade of merchandife, it is almost all in the hands of the lawes, or the Christians of Europe, viz. the Ragusians, Venetians, Genowaies, French or English; the naunall Turks having therein the least to do, holding in that their follarge an Europe no other famous Ciries for trade, more than the foureabove named, viz. Conftantinople, Tauris, A. Reproduct Caire: whereunto may be added Caffa and Theffalonica in Europe's Damafeus, E Tripolis, and Aden in Afia; Alexandria and Algiers in Africke. In our countries here in this Well part of Europe, of the abundance of people of centimes as feet death, but in many parts of the Turks dominions, for want of men to manure the ground most parts of the poore countrey people drawne from their owne dwellings, being inforced with victuals and other recellaries to follow their great armies in their long expeditions, of whom fearer one of ten enter returne home to their dwellings againe, there by the way perishing, if there by the enemies fword, verby the wants, the intemperatenesse of the aire, or immoderate paines raking But to come neerer to our purpose, although the great Turks ordinaty revenues bee no greatter than is aforefaid, yet are his extraordinarie efchears to be greatly accounted of, efpecially his confileations, for feitures, fines, amerciaments (which are right many) his tributes, cufforms F tythes and tenths of all preyes taken by fea or land, with divers other fuch like, far exceeding his flanding and certaine revenue: his Baffaes and other his great Officers like ravening Harpies as it were fucking out the bloud of his poore fubicas, and heaping up ineftinitely realines, which for the most part fall againe into the Grand Signior his coffers, Madine Vizier

By their aduice the great Sultan taketh his war in hand, neither without them conclude th he any peace. They give audience vnto the Embassadours of foreine Princes, who from them receive their dispatch. The greatest honors and preferments (which are many in that so great and large an Empire) are all by their means to be obtained: which maketh them of all others to be fought vinto. Some one or other of them are still Generalson r the great armies of the Turks, especially in these their late wars, their three last Emperors never themselves going forth into the field (exe. pring once that Mahomet the third for the maintenance of his credit with his men of war, came downe into Hungary, and there won the city of Agria:) which leading of fuch mighty armies is still with great emulation and ambition of the Visier Bal-& faes amongst themselves sought after, as well for the great profit thereby unto them axising a for the honour thereof, which is of all other the greatest. Syour Vertues have made you eminent, fo your Fortunes have confirmed that eminence, not only with knowing differences, but others the most ignorant, that informe themselves from mens outsides, and the Glosse which successe sets your quanty parasawith all its significations, bath not the least place; being one free to cherish worthy endeauors in others, by condescending to their defects: And in this assurance, I (a stranger) am bold to present my following labors to be judged of by you; and to the sentence you passe vpon them, all other censures shall subscribe. I consesse I wish some of my sew yeares had been spent abroad, where I might have informed my selfe better from observation, than from reports for my contemplative knowledge renders me more subject to errors, than a practive would have done. Yet is the ensuing hath an allowance from you, your known judgement will command in all men a good opinion of it, and my defects herein be made excuseable, by the stendernesse of my intelligence. My desire is to be reckoned amongst the humblest of your Servants,

The grand Visiet in October, following his first entrance on the defign for Persia after mai 16 2 0. ayviual accidents of War, interruptions in his much, and in firmg a relifiance of his fiege to the loffe of the third part of his army, together with the approchof Winterfthe common hinderer of the Turkes proceedings, as greatest enemy to their conflitmions) bee withdrew his forces, and setuming by the way of Aleppo, remained there formetime to practife his tyrannies. Which had thefe grounds of policie: The Turks being men that conclude all action from the facceffe, and thence allow them merit, grew into fome fulfittion of the great Vizier; belides, their depredations being sometimes hindered by the enemies, other times reconered with the loffe of fome lines, most of their fouldiers returned home poorer than they went forth; a ftrong motine to a mutiny. To prevent which, and to keep his feattered troups infome order, as alfo to hinder the Perfians further attempts, at Aleppo he vied a tyranicall fenerative against all Nations during his stay there; the end of which was exaction onely of finesvpon his judgements, which palt vpon enery complaint, juft or valuft, which cities malice or conecoulneffe could be get upon intention; which foon became pregnant upon obfernance of the grand Viziers disposition. With these exactions be inriched himself, appealed the muttering of his foldiers, and made himfelfe popular: and the afperfion thrown you his. valour, was prefently loft in the opinion conceined of his justice. The English Merchants felt more of this floring than any other nation; for the bufine fies before declared being revi. wed, pretences were from found to imprison the English Conful there, and for the more terror to hing his Druggerman. An infolencie much diffaftefull to the Embaffatour, who note withflanding as yet found not conveniencie for a complaint; the Viziers greatnes and fanciwith the grand Signior beating him out in all his actions.
